Resolved, That the special committee on the powers, duties, and privileges of the House in counting the vote for President and Vice-President be instructed to report what number of electoral votes, in their opinion, is necessary under the Constitution to elect a President and Vice-President.

RECUSANT WITNESSES—RETURNING BOARD OF LOUISIANA.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I rise, in obedience to the rules of the House and under a recent decision of the Speaker, to call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business being called for the House resumes the consideration of the resolution reported yesterday from the Committee on the Judiciary by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. LYNDE.]

The resolution is as follows:

Resolved, That the Speaker of this House issue a warrant under his hand and the seal of the House of Representatives, directing the Sergeant-at-Arms of this House, either by himself or his special deputy, to arrest and bring to the bar of the House without delay J. Madison Wells, Thomas C. Anderson, G. Casanave, and Lewis M.

Kenner, to answer for a contempt of the authority of this House and a breach of privilege in refusing to produce to the special committee of which Hon. WILLIAM E. MORRISON is chairman, now sitting in New Orleans, certain papers, in obedience to a subpœna duces tecum which was duly served upon them, and to be dealt with as the law under the facts may require.

Mr. LYNDE. I ask unanimous consent that the time allowed for debate be extended one hour, subject to the stipulations that were agreed upon yesterday. I yield for ten minutes to the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. O'BRIEN.]

Mr. O'BRIEN. The report and resolution pending before the House meet my entire approval and support. The legal propositions of the report are, in my opinion, correctly stated, and supported by a fair construction of the Constitution of the United States. I see nothing in the resolution which is an invasion of the rights of the States as secured by the terms of the Federal compact. I have resolutely, at all times, and to the extent of my ability, defended the rights of the States as reserved in the Constitution of the United States, and do not intend now to allow them be infringed by any act or vote on this important question. When the electors for President and Vice-President are appointed in due conformity to the limitations of the Constitution, and as the Legislature of the State directs, the State is supreme in the matter of their appointment, and the voice of the State must be respected and obeyed. The vote cast by the electors of a State is the solemn act of a State, and if cast as the Constitution requires, and the electors pursue the line of their duty in strict conformity to the law, their election having been duly attested by the certificate of the governor, as required by the act of Congress of 1792, their appointment and vote are binding on the Congress and must be counted. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I state without reservation that if the electors of Louisiana have been appointed in all respects in the manner in which the Legislature of the State has directed, and if they have pursued strictly the constitutional duty imposed upon them, then their certificate coming before the two Houses of Congress in February next is binding upon that Congress in all respects, as clearly as any legal and constitutional act can bind the parties to it. This is the prima facie case.

Having recognized, Mr. Speaker, the fact that within certain limitations each State has entire control over the question of the appointment of its own electors, and it is a right of the State which it is the duty of this House to sustain to the fullest extent, I recognize further that the Constitution requires that the electors appointed by a State as the Legislature may direct shall be qualified electors; that they shall vote upon a certain day; that their certificate, attested by the governor, shall go regularly and in a constitutional manner into the hands of the President of the Senate, and that he, in the presence of both Houses of Congress, shall open that certificate, and, in the language of the Constitution, the vote shall then be counted. Thus, prima facie, the certificate of the electors, attested as I have before stated, is binding upon the two Houses of Congress. But, Mr. Speaker, I assert without fear of contradiction, that that certificate is binding upon the two Houses of Congress only if in all respects the limitations and provisions of the Constitution have been entirely complied with.

I know, Mr. Speaker, that no one here will pretend that a certificate, though prima facie correct, cannot be examined into and entirely set aside for more than one reason. I assert that if the certificate is one that has been obtained by corruption, that has been obtained by fraud or forgery, if the electors are not qualified according to the Constitution of the United States, if they have not voted in strict pursuance of the limitations of the Constitution, the Congress of the United States, under the Constitution, can inquire into it; and it becomes the duty of Congress to say whether or not in the ascertainment of the vote which is to be counted the vote of the State is in strict conformity and is not vitiated by fraud, if fraud is charged, and whether it should be counted.

Another provision of the Constitution, Mr. Speaker, is that in a certain contingency the House of Representatives, in the name and behalf and by the authority of the American people, shall elect a President. Who is to decide when that contingency may happen? The power which is given to the House I claim includes the right to decide, the right to examine, the right to test the certificates, the right to inquire whether the electors have validly and constitutionally performed their duty, the right to inquire whether they are qualified as the Constitution requires, and further and more importantly the question whether the State has really voted as the certificate represents it to have done; and whether it has been robbed of its high privilege of the appointment of electors by corruption, by forgery, or by fraud.

Now, my friend from Maine [Mr. FRYE] says that public rumor charges that the Louisiana returning board, which it is asserted has the right of canvassing the votes of the State and finally determining the results of the election, has been guilty of fraud. I assert that it is not a public rumor but the universal public sentiment, attested by indubitable proof, sufficient at least to call for the investigation now pending. The House has determined to investigate and has clothed its committee with full power in the premises. Why, Mr. Speaker, question the right of the House or of its committee to make a thorough examination whether fraud has vitiated the vote of the State; whether the constitutional regulations in reference to the election were complied with, and fully and completely whether the returning board has corruptly and fraudulently made a false return of electors for Louisiana? The House and committee having the authority is it not the duty of the committee representing this House to ascertain by all the means of law and by inspection of the original records and papers what the actual vote was? I am aware, Mr. Speaker, that the right of the House is denied. The assertion of power has been denounced vehemently as an invasion of the rights of a State. I would inquire, what constitutes a State? Is it a returning board, with doubtful powers, which has confessedly suppressed the vote of whole parishes and without the least authority of law? Yes, in utter defiance of the law of Louisiana, made corrupt returns. Or shall State rights be defended on some worthier basis, on some higher and more important principle? It is further said that the original records in the custody of the returning board are archives of the State and should not be imperiled, as upon them rests the right of the government of Louisiana and it may be of the United States. This is mere subterfuge. In contests for a seat in Congress the original papers of the State have been produced, even to the ballots cast at the polls. So in contests for State officers the rights of the parties have been vindicated by the production of all the returns.

This question rises higher than any mere contest of the former character. The presidential election may be decided by the vote of Louisiana. This House would have a right to these records to decide the question of the election of one of its members, and yet it is denied that the same power does extend to the election of electors for President and Vice-President. This, to my mind, is untenable, and not worthy of serious argument. In Brightly's Election Cases, page 366, it is laid down that "the true policy to maintain and perpetuate the vote by ballot is found in jealously guarding its purity, in placing no fine-drawn metaphysical obstruction in the way of testing election returns charged as false and fraudulent;" and Judge Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations says: "That back of the prima facie case made by the certificate of election, the courts may go, and the determination of the State board may be corrected by those of the district boards, and the latter by the ballots themselves." This seems to me decisive of the right of the House, the highest court of judicature in the country, to make due inquiry and inspection of any records in a case which pertains to the jurisdiction of Congress. I therefore approve the resolution of the committee in requiring the members of the Louisiana returning board to appear at the bar of this House to answer for contempt of the privileges of the House.

Mr. LYNDE. I now yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] for fifteen minutes.

Mr. HOAR. I do not propose to deal with any of the very interesting public questions which divide the American people by party lines, and which are to be determined, I hope and believe, by constitutional methods during the coming month. I desire to address myself to the simple, narrow question of the constitutional power of this House to require a State to yield up the custody of its archives containing the records of its constitutional and legal action to the authority of either branch of the American Congress.

When I have listened to this report and to the arguments which have been uttered in support of it from the other side of the House, I have been struck with amazement that it should ever have fallen to my lot to defend the rights of an American State against the usurpation of a democratic national House of Representatives. I could not help being reminded of a famous passage in Macaulay which describes the transformations of the political parties in England before the days of the Earl of Chatham. I will ask the Clerk to read the passage I have marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

Dante tells us that he saw, in Malebolge, a strange encounter between a human form and a serpent. The enemies, after cruel wounds inflicted, stood for a time glaring on each other. A cloud surrounded them, and then a wonderful metamorphosis began. Each figure was transfigured into the likeness of its antagonist. The serpent's tail divided itself into two legs; the man's legs intertwined themselves into a tail. The body of the serpent put forth arms; the arms of the man shrank into his body. At length the serpent stood up a man and spake; the man sank down a serpent, and glided hissing away. Something like this was the transformation which, during the reign of George the First, befell the two English parties. Each gradually took the shape and color of its foe, till at length the tory rose up erect the zealot of freedom, and the whig crawled and licked the dust at the feet of power.

Mr. HOAR. Now, whatever words parties in this country may take upon their lips, I am afraid that each party will be found to advocate an extension of the particular authority which it is at the time exercising, and each party will be found to advocate a restrained and curbing of the power which is not at that particular time placed in its hands.

This question, however, seems to me to be a very simple one, and one which is settled by the adjudication of the Supreme Court of the United States in a similar case. Each of these two authorities, State and national, is sovereign and equal in regard to certain subjects. Each of these two authorities, State and national, is paramount within its jurisdiction over every other authority whatsoever.

I, for one, denouncing the heresy which has prevailed and to which the name of "State rights" has been applied, am not afraid of the good old-fashioned term "State sovereignty," which George Washington used in his letter commending the Constitution of the United States to the people for their support.

Now I lay down this proposition, that whatever power the United States House of Representatives has to compel the authority of a State to take the records of that State and bring them here to be held according to our will and to be dealt with according to our pleasure, the Legislature of a State has that same authority over the United States officials within its jurisdiction.

If you may require the journal clerk of the house of representatives of the State of New York, when in session, to bring the journals of that house here, (which is the claim made on the other side of this House,) you may by this same logic claim that the New York house of representatives has authority to require the sub-treasurer or the collector of customs of the United States in New York City to take all the records of his office to the State-house in Albany, and thereby suspend the operations of that department of the United States at their pleasure.

This precise question and principle has arisen in regard to the taxing power. It was claimed by the republican administration of the United States two years ago that because of the necessities of the Government it had the right to subject the salaries of State officers, judicial, executive, or other, to the income tax. And that question came up before the Supreme Court of the United States; and Mr. Justice Nelson, who, I think, will be accepted even by the honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] as good constitutional authority, utters this language which it seems to me is entirely decisive of the present issue:

Two of the great departments of the Government, the executive and legislative, depend upon the exercise of the powers, or upon the people of the States. The Constitution guarantees to the States a republican form of government, and protects each against invasion or domestic violence. Such being the separate and independent condition of the States in our complex system, as recognized by the Constitution, and the existence of which is so indispensable, that, without them, the General Government itself would disappear from the family of nations, it would seem to follow as a reasonable, if not a necessary, consequence that the means and instrumentalities employed for carrying on the operations of their governments, for preserving their existence, and fulfilling the high and responsible duties assigned to them in the Constitution, should be left free and unimpaired, should not be liable to be crippled, much less defeated by the taxing power of another government, which power acknowledges no limits but the will of the legislative body imposing the tax. And more especially those means and instrumentalities which are the creation of their sovereign and reserved rights, one of which is the establishment of the judicial department and the appointment of officers to administer their laws. Without this power, and the exercise of it, we risk nothing in saying that no one of the States under the form of government guaranteed by the Constitution could long preserve its existence.

And he goes on to say:

It is admitted that there is no express provision in the Constitution that prohibits the General Government from taxing the means and instrumentalities of the States, nor is there any prohibiting the States from taxing the means and instrumentalities of that Government. In both cases the exemption rests upon necessary implication and is upheld by the great law of self-preservation; as any government whose means employed in conducting its operations, if subject to the control of another and distinct government, can exist only at the mercy of that government.

Now, Mr. Speaker, does any gentleman believe that you cannot impose upon the salary of a judge of probate (which was the particular case that gave rise to this opinion) an income tax by which, in common with all other citizens of the United States of like ability, he is required to contribute his share to the preservation and support of the National Government, because you are by that measure affecting and crippling an instrumentality of State sovereignty; and will he still claim that you can present yourself to that judge sitting in court and command him to send the dockets and records of the court up to Washington or out of his legal custody and thus have the proceedings of the court stopped or the evidence of the acts of the court removed from the reach of the people who are interested in them?

Mr. BLAND. Does the gentleman hold that a committee of Congress has not the right to compel the production of the ballots and other official papers connected with the contested election of a member of Congress? Have not our committees often counted ballots cast in the different counties of the States?

Mr. HOAR. I have no doubt whatever that the claim implied in the question of the gentleman is correct.

Mr. BLAND. Then we can compel the production of such records?

Mr. HOAR. You can compel the production of records, as the gentleman from Mississippi argued the other day, through the power of tribunals to issue subpœnæ duces tecum.

Mr. BLAND. But I speak of the ballots and records of an election. We do compel their production.

Mr. HOAR. I reply that these records which you now seek are not the records for elections for members of Congress.

Mr. BLAND. But certainly the same power exists in the one case as in the other.

Mr. HOAR. I ask the gentleman to hear me a moment. The records now in question are the records of an act which, as was well said yesterday, is the highest act of a sovereign State. They include the record of the elections from which the governor, the Legislature, and nearly every officer of the government of Louisiana derive their title.

Mr. BLAND. But, Mr. Speaker, the position of the gentleman, as I understood, was that we had no power to compel the production of State records. Now he admits that we have such power in some cases; and I do not see the ground of the distinction which he draws.

Mr. HOAR. Either the gentleman has not done me the honor to listen to my argument, or else I have been unfortunate in making myself clear. Nobody doubts that there is such a thing as a subpœna duces tecum. Nobody doubts that there is power to compel the production of papers; nobody doubts that there are certain classes of records to which the principle I assert does not apply. But my point is that the records of the election of the governor, Legislature, and State officers of Louisiana, that the records of the election of presidential electors by that State—officers who by the Constitution are to be appointed by the State in such a manner as the Legislature thereof shall direct—are records essential to the preservation of the government and sovereignty of the State itself and that you can no more lay your hands upon those records and take them out of the territory of the State to which they belong, thereby perhaps (carrying the power to its extreme) stopping the entire functions of the State government, than a State Legislature can under like authority lay its hands upon the records of the custom-house or the United States courts or the sub-treasury and stop the functions and proceedings of the United States Government.

Mr. LYNDE. I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia, [Mr. HEREFORD.]

Mr. HEREFORD. Mr. Speaker, the question now under discussion is, as I understand it, when properly confined, within very narrow limits, and for the purpose of showing the precise scope of this question I send to the Clerk's desk and I ask to have read the resolution now pending before the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Speaker of this House issue a warrant under his hand and the seal of the House of Representatives, directing the Sergeant-at-Arms of this House, either by himself or his special deputy, to arrest and bring to the bar of the House without delay J. Madison Wells, Thomas C. Anderson, G. Casanave, and Lewis M. Kenner, to answer for a contempt of the authority of this House and a breach of privilege in refusing to produce to the special committee of which Hon. WILLIAM R. MORRISON is chairman, now sitting in New Orleans, certain papers, in obedience to a subpœna duces tecum which was duly served upon them, and to be dealt with as the law under the facts may require.

Mr. HEREFORD. The question then before the House is whether these parties should be brought before the bar of this House to show cause why they should not be punished for a contempt of this House of Representatives; a contempt in doing or neglecting to do—what? There is the whole point and the whole object of this resolution. They are to be brought here to answer for their contempt in refusing to produce before our committee sitting at New Orleans, of which WILLIAM R. MORRISON is chairman, certain documents; not to be taken out of the State, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] has said. This House has never yet ordered those papers to be brought from that State. But that committee, a part and parcel of this House, clothed with all the powers of the House so far as this proceeding is concerned, have demanded by subpœna duces tecum that these parties should appear before them and bring certain documents—returns, ballots, depositions, and affidavits—that were before them; in other words, bring before the committee the vote of the people of Louisiana. This they refused to do. Those papers are within a stone's-throw of where that committee was sitting. Yet those men refuse to produce those papers; they even refuse to allow an inspection of them.

Why, sir, wherever the common law prevails the right of the people to inspect public records has never been denied until to-day. I read from Greenleaf on Evidence, volume 1, section 471:

First, in regard to the inspection of public documents, it has been admitted from a very early period that the inspection and exemplification of the records of the king's courts is the common right of the subject.

Yet to-day we are told by the gentlemen on the opposite side of the House that a record of a self-constituted returning board shall not be seen by an American citizen! Has it come to this? Where is the authority that any of the gentlemen on the other side have yet produced going to show that we have not a right to inspect those records? No lawyer can rise in his seat on this floor and say that, if a court of competent jurisdiction was in session in the city of New Orleans and that court needed certain public records for the elucidation of any question before that court, it would not have the right, and that it would not be its duty, to issue a subpœna duces tecum to bring any and all such records into that court. Any other decision would be a mockery, a cheat, a fraud. No lawyer standing in his place upon this floor can deny that legal proposition.

The only question then is, has the House of Representatives jurisdiction over the subject-matter? That this House has decided, that the Senate has decided, that the House of Representatives and Senate both and singly have the right to inquire into the subject-matter. Having that right, they have all the incidental powers to accomplish that investigation.

But gentlemen on their side are all at once great defenders of State sovereignty. Why is it, I ask, at every stage of this investigation and every other investigation, we are met with obstacles, objections, and doubts? Ah, we have seen for years past that governors can be dethroned. No question, no objection, no protest then comes from the other side. Legislatures can be invaded, disbanded by midnight order of a drunken judge, and yet no protest comes from the other side.

I state it as a proposition, Mr. Speaker, that no gentleman will deny—I have not time to go over all the facts—that this returning board has no legal existence whatever. It was brought into existence and perpetuated by the bayonet; by the same power that disbanded the Legislature of Louisiana.

Well does it become us, imperative is it upon us that we should investigate any returns made by such a man as J. Madison Wells. I hold in my hand the report of the committee of which Mr. GEORGE F. HOAR was chairman and of which Mr. Foster, of Ohio, and Mr. William Walter Phelps were members; and in that report, on page 3, this same man Wells, the president of the board, it is stated, made an affidavit than intimidation had existed at certain polls in a certain parish, but at the same time it is also stated in that same report that the same man, J. Madison Wells, who swore to intimidation in that parish, was not in the parish on the day of election and swore to facts of which he could have had no personal knowledge. That affidavit was found among those returns when the committee made the parties bring them before it. That affidavit, false as it was, false as it must have been, swearing as J. Madison Wells did about facts of which he could personally have had no knowledge, not being present in the parish on the day of election, was found by the committee among the papers.

We want all these papers for the purpose of showing that the originals have been mutilated. We want the voice of the people to be heard. The voice of the people will and must be heard in deciding this very grave question now before the people. We seek by this investigation the truth. All honest men, all over the land, irrespective of party, want the truth and demand that the voice of the people shall be heard. The right of suffrage is the very life-blood of liberty. It is inseparable from political equality and independence of man, and its honest exercise is alike the safety and glory of popular government.

Mr. LYNDE. I yield now twenty minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS.]

Mr. BANKS. Mr. Speaker, it was not my purpose to take part in the debate on this subject, but one or two suggestions which have fallen from gentlemen on the other side of the House, who have directly or indirectly spoken to this question, have induced me to say a few words.

The gentlemen from West Virginia [Mr. HEREFORD] who has just taken his seat cited an authority, as I understood him, in regard to the production of the records of the Supreme Court. It was difficult to understand exactly what he said, on account of the confusion in the House and because of the distance at which I sit from the place from which he spoke. I understood him to cite Mr. Greenleaf as authority for the position that the records of the Supreme Court might be demanded if necessary. I will inquire if that is the gentleman's position?

Mr. HEREFORD. The gentleman from Massachusetts misunderstood me. I said nothing about the records of the Supreme Court. I read the language of Greenleaf himself, who says:

> First, in regard to the inspection of public documents, it has been admitted from a very early period that the inspection and exemplification of the records of the king's court is the common right of the subject.

Mr. BANKS. Very well, Mr. Speaker; I am quite willing to yield my assent to the authority cited or to the statement of that fact by the gentleman from West Virginia without any authority at all. The record of the king's court is the record of its acts, of its decisions or judgments in the cases tried before it. These records do not touch the authority or the existence of the king's court in any way whatever; and if it were true, of which I have no doubt, that the record of these decisions is open to inspection and exemplification, as Greenleaf says it is, that the original records should be taken from the king's courts or the courts of this country, the Supreme Court or any other court, to a distance, and placed in the hands of persons wholly irresponsible for their preservation and return, I doubt whether any court would be required to dispose of their records in that manner. But the "inspection and exemplification" spoken of by Greenleaf is a very different affair. And in neither case could it be considered a proceeding like that to which the House is now called upon to give its assent.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The books do not say the papers may be taken from their custody, but only that inspection shall be allowed and copies taken.

Mr. BANKS. That is undoubtedly the true interpretation of the authority.

Mr. HEREFORD. Now if my friend will allow me——

Mr. BLAND. Let me ask the gentleman from Massachusetts——

Mr. BANKS. I will yield to the gentleman from Mississippi in a moment, but I am now listening to the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. HEREFORD. If my friend from Massachusetts will allow me, he will find in the answer which this man Wells and others made to the committee that they refused to allow an inspection of these papers.

Mr. BANKS. I do not understand that to be the fact. On the contrary, I understand that these original documents have been open to the inspection of the committee, and that such an exemplification as that spoken of in the authority cited has never been refused. Of the records of the courts, I understand that they are both the records of the cases tried and the judgments given, and their preservation and destruction would not affect in the slightest degree the authority or the existence of the court itself. They are the mere records of cases decided in the past. And undoubtedly the production either of those records or of copies of those records would be yielded to anybody that had the right to ask for them at any time whatever

Mr. BLAND. Is not that all that is demanded; an inspection of these records?

Mr. BANKS. It is not all. The demand that is made now stands upon entirely different ground, and is wholly irreconcilable with the authority which has been read by the gentleman from West Virginia. The records of the courts when surrendered as a proof of certain facts do not affect, if they are destroyed, the existence or the authority of the court at all; and therefore the citation is of no account whatever in this discussion; and that the proposition of the gentleman from Missouri in his inquiry of my colleague——

Mr. BLAND. Let me state my proposition. If the gentleman will advise his returning board to let us inspect these records it will end all these proceedings, and he knows it, and that side of the House knows it.

Mr. BANKS. I want to make a remark to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] in regard to the inquiry he made of my colleague [Mr. HOAR] as to the evidence to be produced in case of a contested election—I do not know that I understood him exactly, because the confusion and the distance may perhaps have prevented it. But if I understand him correctly he says that in a case of contested election the committee of investigation are entitled to have even the ballots that have been given, and the poll-lists and all other papers connected with the polls, and that, if desired, they must be brought here. Is that the gentleman's position?

Mr. BLAND. No, sir.

Mr. BANKS. What was it, then?

Mr. BLAND. I will state it. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] took the position that this House had no power to interfere with the State records and compel their production before a committee of this House. And I say it has been the practice of this House in investigating congressional contests to investigate State records and to have them before the committee, and that is all that is desired here.

Mr. BANKS. In the case of a contested election there is no evidence required or which can be required by the House of Representatives the production of which is not authorized by an express provision of the Constitution. But there is not an instance where any record the loss or destruction of which could in any way affect the authority or existence of the Government has been taken from its original possessors and deposited with irresponsible persons who could give no security for its preservation and return.

Mr. BLAND. If the gentleman's doctrine be correct, we could not investigate any congressional election.

Mr. BANKS. There is no parity between the two cases. It is impossible to institute any just comparison between the records on papers connected with a State election, congressional or otherwise, and the records which are demanded by the resolution now before the House.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to me for a moment?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. BANKS. I will, if it does not come out of my time.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman yields, it must necessarily come out of his time.

Mr. BANKS. Then I cannot yield.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts declines to yield and will speak without interruption.

Mr. BANKS. The record demanded by the House in this case is a record upon which the integrity and authority of the government of Louisiana, and possibly of the election of the President of the United States, may depend. The records of courts and the papers connected with an election have no such character. That is my answer to these gentlemen.

What is the record demanded? The original return upon which is based at this moment the government of the State of Louisiana, without which it cannot show an authority for its existence, and the original evidence and proof upon which are to be founded hereafter the election of a President of the United States and the organization of the Government of the United States. That is the record that these gentlemen demand. That is the record that is called for by this resolution. Sir, these gentlemen cannot find in the history of this country a single instance where such a demand has been made; nor can any member justify for one moment the State of Louisiana or its officers in surrendering to irresponsible hands the record upon which their government is based and the Government of the United States may possibly be based hereafter.

Mr. SOUTHARD. If the gentleman will allow me, I will give him an instance.

Mr. BANKS. What is it?

Mr. SOUTHARD. I have here a Senate report of the third session of the Forty-second Congress, made by the Committee on Privileges and Elections of the Senate, consisting of Mr. Carpenter, Mr. MORTON——

Mr. BANKS. Give us what they called for. My time is short.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I was about to give you the names of the committee, the remainder of whom are Messrs. ALCORN, LOGAN, Trumbull, and Hill, of Georgia. This committee, on the 16th day of January, 1873, was ordered to inquire whether there was in Louisiana a State government; and also to the same committee were referred the credentials of Mr. McMillan and Mr. Ray, Senators elected, one by the Kellogg and the other by the McEnery government; and the committee in their investigation summoned to Washington the members of the Lynch and the Forman (the Kellogg and McEnery) returning boards, and also had all returns and papers of both boards produced before them; all of which is published in the Senate volume of reports to the third session of the Forty-second Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. BANKS. Mr. Speaker, that does not meet the case at all. It is a totally different case.

Mr. HOAR. I move that the galleries be cleared.

The SPEAKER. The noise was not in the galleries, but on the floor.

Mr. HOAR. Then the motion is, that the galleries shall not be exposed to so bad an example on the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that, so far as he was able to hear, the galleries have not made any infringement of the rules of the House, and that the noise was on the floor; and the Chair hopes he will not again be subjected to criticism by reason of a violation of the rules of the House and his inability to enforce them.

Mr. BANKS. The case cited by the gentleman from Ohio does not meet this question at all. [Laughter.] No, sir! In the case the gentleman has cited the existence of the government of Louisiana was at stake. It was a question as to whether the Government of the United States was to be called upon to recognize or establish one or the other of two rival factions, and of course the evidence upon which the claim of each was based must be produced. There was nothing in it beyond that. But here is a proposition which affects the existence of a recognized and established State government. [Laughter.] And to demand the records upon which that government is based affects the existence of the government itself. There is no such contest here as that referred to in the records of the Senate. There are no rival factions here seeking the recognition of the United States, and no Senators contending for seats. The demand now made is upon a government as perfectly established as that of any State in the Union.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I want to ask the gentleman a question, and I will do it in a word or two.

Mr. BANKS. My time is limited, and I cannot yield. The record that is called for by this resolution and by the gentlemen advocating it is the record of the electoral vote of the State of Louisiana, and includes, of course, that of State officers, and it will be conceded by every man that upon that record may possibly depend the election of the President of the United States. If it be destroyed, the original evidence will have been destroyed upon which that election must rest. Now I want to call the attention of the gentlemen on the other side of the House to one fact which is important in this connection, and that is that the reason assigned for the refusal to comply with the demand of the committee is that the State of Louisiana had surrendered its records to committees of the House before, and had lost them, and therefore they were not inclined again to imperil their records. And the State of Louisiana is justified in that declaration. If this record is surrendered to a committee of this House—I make no impeachment of the integrity of any committee or any member of any committee—it is surrendered to an absolutely irresponsible party. It may be lost by accident, or destroyed by design, and then important records, upon which the existence not only of the State government but of the Government of the United States may depend, will be lost.

Mr. BLAND. Does the gentleman think that a committee of this House would destroy any such document?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri is not in order. The gentleman from Massachusetts declines to be interrupted.

Mr. BANKS. I repeat that I cannot yield. I do not impeach or question the integrity of any committee. I say again that the State of Louisiana has given as its reason for refusing to produce the original records in this case that their records were produced before a committee of the House and were not and have not been returned, and that they do not wish to incur that risk again. I understand that to be the case, and I think that this fact justifies the position taken by these officers who have been summoned; and I say, therefore, that it is a perfectly satisfactory answer to the demands of the committee.

The case now presented to the House transcends in importance that referred to by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SOUTHARD,] or the records of courts to which reference has been made by other gentlemen, and no precedents arising from cases of contested elections can affect our judgment in this case; for, if these records are lost or destroyed, and they may be lost by accident or destroyed by design, the most important original evidence that exists as to the organization of the government of Louisiana and of the choice of electors will have been lost, and the manifestations of applause from the galleries and the other side of the House, and that yell which the House heard yesterday, and which has become historic, shows the extent to which some men not connected with this House are willing to go in a matter of this kind.

Now what is demanded? It is demanded to take from the government of Louisiana the very evidence of its foundation upon which its authority ought to be and must be based. In what instance has any government ever been called upon to deliver the muniments of its title and the proofs of its recognized right of existence to anybody not connected with the government itself? What would the State of Massachusetts or any other State say were they called upon to deliver up the records of their Legislature and executive departments, or the documents upon which the existence of these governments depended, to be brought here or carried to other parts of the country? Sir, they would not deliver them. They would refuse to do it absolutely. There is no State in the Union that would not do as Louisiana has done.

Now, what is the reason given for this unprecedented and extraordinary demand? The committee gives a reason. What is it? It is public rumor. Public rumor is to give us authority to take from a sovereign State the very records that identify its character and justify its existence, to be deposited in the hands of a committee, or which may fall into the hands of other persons who may preserve them and may not. Public rumor! This is the only assigned cause of action. Whence does that public rumor spring? From the people who make the demand and the party they represent in this country who may have an interest in the possession of the original evidence of the choice of presidential electors.

Sir, the peace and constitutional duration of the State government of Louisiana depend upon the questions whether these original records are to be preserved or destroyed. The State of Louisiana ought never to surrender them except to superior physical force. We ought never to suffer the State of Louisiana to be deprived of them unless by a power stronger than the Government of the United States.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The records containing the evidence by which the State officers, including members of the State Legislature, hold the title to their respective offices.

Mr. BANKS. Yes, as my friend says, the evidence of the title of State officers to their offices. No public rumor, if it comes from interested parties, can be sufficient ground for a demand of this character. I say again that this demand is without precedent in the history of this country.

I ask gentlemen to look at the condition of the electoral college. Admitting, as is claimed on this side of the House, and as I myself believe, that the House of Representatives has no right whatever to control the votes of the electoral colleges or their action concerning the Presidency, but conceding, if there be a desire on the part of other people to inquire into their proceedings, that there shall be the right to make all the investigations they please, will gentlemen tell this House where the House gets the power to demand the surrender of these records upon which alone the presidential contest is to be decided so far as the State of Louisiana is concerned? Tell us where the House gets the power to demand possession of these documents which, if destroyed, may give the party dominant in this House the control of the Government, and which, if preserved, may deprive them of that power? I want to know if my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. LYNDE] holds that a mere matter of public rumor, of which interested parties are authors and exponents, is a sufficient ground for a demand of this character?

Mr. LYNDE. I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD] for five minutes.

Mr. HURD. The exact question which is presented by this discussion for the decision of the House is, has the House of Representatives the power to compel the production before it of the papers called for by one of its investigating committees, which papers are now in the custody of the returning board of the State of Louisiana? This question necessarily involves the other question as to the power of the Congress of the United States to inquire as to the conduct and examine the papers of State officials. When gentlemen on the other side interpose, as an objection to the force of the position which was taken by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. LYNDE,] that the States have rights which the Congress of the United States cannot interfere with, they simply beg the whole question in the argument. The question is, has the Congress of the United States power to inquire as to the conduct and examine the papers of State officials? And they answer that those officials are officers of the State, and therefore Congress cannot inquire. A more palpable, manifest begging of the question I have never known in a discussion.

The real question is, has the Congress of the United States, or more particularly has this House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States the power to make the investigation which was directed when this Louisiana committee was authorized to be appointed? If it possessed the power to order such an investigation, then necessarily the committee so appointed to investigate must possess the power to complete and effectuate the investigation.

What was the order of the House? It was that this Louisiana committee should "investigate the recent election therein, and the action of the returning or canvassing board in the said State in reference thereto, and to report all the facts essential to an honest return of all the votes received by the electors of the said State for President and Vice-President of the United States." So far as this Forty-fourth Congress is concerned I might rest this argument upon the decision which this House has already rendered upon this question. That resolution, if I recollect aright, was passed by a two-thirds vote. The House having acted, there is, therefore, no need to inquire further. But I will not rest the argument upon that.

I will proceed to show very briefly that under the Constitution of the United States the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States has the right to pass this resolution and to order this investigation. The Constitution provides that the Legislatures of the several States shall make provision for choosing the electors who shall elect the President and Vice-President of the United States. In another provision the Constitution gives Congress the power to carry out all the provisions of the Constitution. We have therefore the authority to inquire whether the electors have been chosen by the Legislature of a State or in pursuance of laws enacted by that Legislature.

Again the Constitution of the United States provides that certain persons shall be ineligible to hold the office of elector. The Congress of the United States has the right to inquire whether the persons chosen by the several States are eligible to act as electors.

The Constitution of the United States guarantees to every State a republican form of government, and if a State has not a republican form of government, then it has no right to choose electors for President and Vice-President. The Constitution of the United States therefore gives Congress the power to inquire in this connection whether a State has a republican form of government.

The laws of the United States provide that the electoral colleges shall meet at a certain time and that the election of the electors shall be certified by the executive officers of the several States. The Congress of the United States must inquire whether these electors have met as provided by law and whether the executives of the States have properly certified to their election. In discharging all these duties either House must possess the power to make inquiry for itself.

Again, and finally, the Congress of the United States has the power to count the electoral vote. I will not enter into this discussion now at length, but will simply declare that by all the precedents and all the discussions which have thus far occurred it is conceded that the Congress of the United States may pass a law in relation to counting the electoral vote; and if it can pass a law for that purpose, then either House of the Congress has a right to inquire into all the facts in order to be able to pass the law intelligently.

From these provisions of the Constitution I derive the power of the House of Representatives to make this investigation. In making this investigation witnesses may be subpœnaed from all parts of the country; the power of Congress in that respect is unlimited. And those witnesses may be obliged to produce records, papers, and documents in their possession. That power is unlimited, save as it may be limited by some of the well-ascertained exceptions of the law.

In the present case I submit that the inquiries which were made of this returning board, which it was alleged had certain papers in its possession, were pertinent because it has been charged that the electors have not been chosen in the State of Louisiana as the laws of that State require. By the laws of Louisiana the people of the State choose the electors. It has been charged that in point of fact the returning board of Louisiana has chosen the electors. It was proper, in order that the committee should determine this question, that they should see the official records of the returning board, that they might decide whether it was true that the board had made the election. It has been charged that ineligible electors were voted for in that State; and in order that it might be known whether electors were ineligible or not, it might become necessary that the documents and records in possession of this board should be inspected.

It has been charged that the returning board is a usurpation; that it has changed what was a republican form of government, created by the constitution of the State, into a government not republican in form; that substantially republican government, republican institutions, and republican ideas have been trampled under foot by the powers exercised by this returning board. To know whether they have exercised such powers, to know how they have exercised them, this committee has the right to examine the records that the returning board have made.

It is claimed that there are two chief executive officers in the State of Louisiana and it is understood that two sets of returns have been sent here, signed by two different executives. Questions as to what is the proper authority of the State, questions as to who is the chief executive officer of a State, are questions properly belonging to the jurisdiction of this committee, and to determine which they might find it necessary to examine the documents in the hands of the returning board.

Lastly, it is charged that there has been gross fraud in the State of Louisiana, that the will of the people has been thwarted, that forgeries and perjuries have been committed, that books have been altered and records changed, that documents have been destroyed and false documents substituted in their stead. When you come to determine who shall count the electoral vote and what electoral votes shall be counted, the committee have the right to go into all these inquiries, to bring these papers before them in order that they may see if forgery has been committed as charged. Forgery is poorly proven by a copy; the original paper must be inspected. I say, therefore, that this investigating committee had the power to make all these inquiries and that there was a necessity for making them, because of these charges with which we are familiar and with which the whole country must be familiar.

But this returning board attempt to bring themselves within the exception of the law. They have made answer, it is said, that they are officials of the State of Louisiana, and as such cannot be compelled to give up these documents. I say, in answer to the suggestion of several distinguished gentlemen upon the other side, that I am not fearful of any invasion of State rights upon this proposition. I do not believe that upon the theories of this Government there can be any stronger State-rights democrat upon this floor than I am. But I say that, in the position which declares the Constitution of the United States within its sphere to be supreme, there is nothing inconsistent with the true theory of State rights. The Constitution of the United States, as I have shown, authorizes these investigations. The committee are acting under this power conferred by the Constitution, and in the discharge of their duty they are there in Louisiana. If it be proper and legitimate, under the Constitution of the United States, for the committee to proceed, the constitution of Louisiana cannot interfere; much less can the ministerial officers of the State interfere. In the exercise of a power conferred by the Constitution our committee are there; and the parties called upon, whether they be governors or lieutenant governors, or returning boards, or other State officers, must make return before the committee in response to their subpœna.

But they say that these documents are in their possession as public records. If as public records, then, by the well-established rule from the beginning of civil government until now, the people are interested in public records and have a right to know what those records are. If they are public records of the State of Louisiana and concern the people of the United States, those officers are bound to produce them before the committee. If they were State secrets, if they concerned private affairs relating to the administration of the government there, it might then be another matter. But according to their own showing these are public records; and, if public records, they must be produced in order that the public may be informed.

They say that they hold these papers as officers. I say that they do not hold them as officers. I say that these records and documents are in their hands as individuals. I say that under the law of the State of Louisiana that returning board had no power to count the electoral vote. I do not propose to enter into this argument now, but at another time I shall undertake to demonstrate it to this House. The returning board has no more to do with the electoral returns than has the House of Representatives. If, therefore, these returns are in their possession, they are in their possession as individuals; and as such they must respond to this writ and produce them.

But again, supposing they were in their hands properly as a returning board, their work is done; the electoral vote has been counted; the electors have acted. The laws of the State of Louisiana make no provision for the keeping of these documents, and unless the law makes provision for keeping them, they are not public documents. If they are not public documents then they are in the hands of every individual who may possess them, exactly as these documents are in my hand, to be produced upon proper process before any tribunal that has power to order their production.

Mr. Speaker, this discussion involves not only the power and right of this House; it involves the rights of the people of the country as dependent upon the election in the State of Louisiana. My colleague [Mr. GARFIELD] was, I thought, very unfortunate yesterday in an allusion which he made. He stated that in 1845 frauds had been perpetrated in this very State of Louisiana, by which ("sad and disgraceful," as he declared the act to be) James K. Polk was elected President of the United States. I could not imagine the reason why the gentleman referred to the fraud in Louisiana in 1845, unless as a precedent for the fraud in Louisiana in 1876 and 1877. He said, Mr. Speaker, that the great whig party then yielded to the fraud, acquiesced in the outrage; but I say, Mr. Speaker, that their acquiescence in fraud and outrage is not a precedent to be followed by the democratic party and the people of the country this day. [Applause.]

Mr. LYNDE. I now yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] for ten minutes.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, the question before the House involves legal and constitutional considerations, and offers, in my judgment, no theme for declamation.

Congress is not, as the British Parliament is said to be, omnipotent. Ours is not an imperial Government, but a complex one, in which there are rights and duties pertaining to the States over which Congress has no control. The returning board of Louisiana, so far as the Legislature had devolved functions upon it, (for the constitutionality of the law creating the board has been affirmed by the supreme court, and is therefore unquestioned,) is the State of Louisiana. It is the court of final resort in determining the results of all elections had in that State; and unless Congress can overthrow the sovereignty of each and every State it cannot invade the findings of that board.

Much has been said in derogation of the character of the board. I went to Louisiana before the counting began, with no predilection in its favor. I went reluctantly, and only when urged by adherents of both of the political parties. I was present at its sessions and witnessed the manner in which the board performed its duties. Its sessions were held in public. They were all attended by the numerous counsel of the democratic party and democratic contestants. All proceedings were in the presence of and noted by two skilled phonographers, one chosen by the representatives of the democratic party and the other by the representatives of the republican party, who were also present in person. The proceedings thus noted were published in detail each day and spread before the country.

The consultation of the judges was, as judicial consultations ever are, held in private, and the attempt now making by a committee of this House, in aid of which the power of the House is now solicited, is not to get at the facts of the case which have been thus spread before the country, but is to go into the consultation-room to determine whether the judges of that court of final resort, representing the sovereignty of the State, arrived at the conclusion to which the papers would bring the members of that committee.

Who elects the President of the United States? The American people? No, if you speak of them as a unit or entirety. The American people, as citizens of the respective States, elect the President; and more than one of our distinguished Presidents have been elected, and their election remained uncontested and undisputed by a soul, who received but a comparatively small minority of the votes of the whole people of the country. Their minority of votes was so distributed as to give them a majority in the electoral college, and that college represented the States in their sovereign capacity.

Only when the sad alternative—and I use this phrase as coming down from the framers of the Constitution—only when the sad alternative occurs that the States failed to make an election, is it permitted to the people of the United States, in their capacity of a political people through their Representatives, to assume the functions of the States and elect a President. They can then only exercise the functions of States because the States have failed to exercise them.

Now the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD] has said it has been charged the election in Louisiana was not fairly conducted; that the electors of Louisiana were not properly chosen. Be it so. These are questions the State must settle, and the State by previous legislation had referred them to the returning board as a court of final jurisdiction, and the decision of that court is conclusive upon this House so long as it respects the rights of the States or the safeguards of the Constitution. Pinckney answered all the gentleman's suggestions in 1800 in the great debate as to who elect the President and who may inquire into alleged frauds or irregularities in the State elections. He said:

> Knowing that it was the intention of the Constitution to make the President completely independent of the Federal Legislature, I well remember it was the object, as it is at present, not only the spirit but the letter of that instrument, to give to Congress no interference in or control over the election of a President. * * *
> This right of determining on the manner in which the electors shall vote, the inquiry into the qualifications, and the guards that are necessary to prevent disqualified or improper men voting, and to insure the votes being legally given, rests and is exclusively vested in State Legislatures. If it is necessary to have guards against improper elections of electors and to institute tribunals to inquire into their qualifications, with the State Legislatures, and with them alone, rests the power to institute them, and they must exercise it.

But, sir, as we were reminded by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] yesterday, after great deliberation each House matured a bill for determining presidential elections, about which questions might be raised, which failed to become a law because the two Houses could not agree upon certain details; but both Houses agreed upon a provision in their adopted draught of a law which excluded the jurisdiction now claimed for the House to inquire into the number of votes cast for electors. It in express terms excluded from the jurisdiction of the proposed joint committee all such "disputes relative to President and Vice-President of the United States * * * as might relate to the number of votes by which the electors may have been appointed."

Yes, this august tribunal proposed to be created by the great men of that day, who came here fresh from framing the Constitution, was to be carefully prohibited from exercising any of the functions inimical to the sovereignty which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD] claimed as belonging to a committee of this House.

Where are your doctrines of State rights, if a committee of Congress, disregarding all the provisions of the Constitution, disregarding all the monitions of its framers, may, of its own arbitrary will, invade the consultation-room of the court of final resort established by a State Legislature, and overthrow its election because the facts lead them to a judgment other than that at which that court had arrived.

Mr. LYNDE. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. HARRIS.]

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. In the few moments allowed me, it cannot be expected that I can enter with any minuteness into a discussion of the legal questions involved in this resolution. But it seems to me that the gentlemen on the other side either do not comprehend, or, comprehending, do not desire to discuss the question before the House. The question before the House is not whether Wells and company shall be brought here or not, as an original question. The question is whether they shall be punished for their contempt in not having gone before the special committee in New Orleans and carried with them, in obedience to the subpœna duces tecum, the papers therein called for. To deny that right to the committee is to deny the validity in all cases of the subpœna duces tecum.

The subpœna duces tecum was intended to reach something which could not be reached by any ordinary subpœna. The records being in the legal custody of another party, you cannot bring them without bringing the party with them to take care of them and protect them. The law contemplates that these records shall be in the custody of a legal party; and hence that the party who holds the custody of those records shall come with them, watch over them, and take care of them, while they are being examined by the parties calling for them; and that, after being examined, they may be returned to their proper and legal custody.

Suppose that in some remote part of the State of Louisiana any circuit court wanted the records of another circuit court or court of appeal, will gentlemen assert that there is no power in that court to compel the clerk, the custodian of the records, to come and bring those records for personal inspection? The question may turn on the validity of the record and can only be tested by the inspection of the record itself. It may turn on the forgery of the record as in this case, which can only be determined by the inspection of the paper. And for the failure to do so, for the failure to come before the committee, and bring these papers and submit them for inspection with their blots, blurs, interlineations, erasures, and changes, and their certificates dated long after the postmarks of the envelope containing them—for this failure it is proposed that they shall be brought to the bar of the House. It was to evade the exhibition of these changes that they proposed to give copies which would not show any of the facts that appeared on the face of the original papers, and thus conceal the fraud which this House and the country demand shall be made to appear to an outraged people and for the enlightenment of this House in the discharge of its important duty.

Sir, if I take the doctrine of my friends on my right, then this power of subpœna duces tecum amounts to nothing. These parties having failed to appear, this House is called upon not to bring them here with the records—they are not required to bring the records out of the State; but they are required to come here in person to answer for what is in the nature of a criminal offense in having disobeyed the order and subpœna of this House. It is well known to gentlemen on all sides that where a court has jurisdiction and where any one has violated the law he can be taken across the county line or across the State line, so far as the jurisdiction of the court extends; and as Congress has a jurisdiction co-extensive with the whole country and these parties have failed to appear before this committee, we have the right to bring them here and make them answer for their offense; not for the purpose of bringing those papers with them.

It was refreshing yesterday to hear gentlemen on the other side talk about State rights. My friend from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] delivered a eulogy on State rights. I thought, sir, how I had sat with that gentleman here for six years when he had seen State after State in the South overburdened by the pressure of the military power of the Government; when he had seen the military sent from State to State to influence elections with the facility with which the men are moved on a chess-board and no voice came from that gentleman. After all that it was refreshing to find that at this late day he was going to be a States-right man. I was delighted also to hear him quote the authority which even the people down in the South have now ceased to quote—Pinckney, a South Carolina statesman. My friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] who has just taken his seat, also intrenched himself behind the opinions of this South Carolina statesman. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] has a right to do that. The doctrines of South Carolina had their origin in that gentleman's State. But I deny the right of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] to go to South Carolina for authority. I would say, if it be not coarse to say it, that when they quote Pinckney——

Mr. HOAR. I would ask my friend whether the free-trade doctrines of South Carolina originated in Massachusetts?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I allude to the secession doctrine of South Carolina, which had its origin in Massachusetts, and not to free-trade notions.

But, Mr. Speaker, I felt like exclaiming, when I heard my friend from Ohio quoting Pinckney, of South Carolina, as authority, "The devil can quote scripture for his purpose;" but it might be regarded coarse to say it; therefore I will not.

The gentleman is politically sick and will seek any doctor in this emergency, but when he gets well he will abandon the doctrine upon which he now relies. Sir, you know the old couplet:

> The devil was sick, the devil a monk would be;
> The devil was well, the devil a monk was he.

I am satisfied that my friend from Ohio is now politically sick, and when his sickness is over he will return to his old doctrine of consolidation.

Mr. Speaker, we want this returning board here. We want them here to answer for their contempt. My friend from Ohio on yesterday spoke of their high and pious virtues, when history tells us this very board while he was sitting there in their presence opened a certificate which contained an affidavit dated one week later than the post-mark on the sealed envelope, and he never opened his lips to condemn them; and the Senator from his State—no, it would not be in order for me to refer to him in that connection—but his colleague from Ohio at New Orleans exclaimed that that was a forgery.

Mr. GARFIELD. What does the gentleman state?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Unlike the gentleman, I was not in New Orleans to witness the counting of the electoral vote of the State.

Mr. GARFIELD. Well, if the gentleman was not there, why does he make a statement in regard to what occurred there?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I state that when the clerk of the returning board was called upon to open an envelope duly sealed and postmarked the 18th of November, when that envelope was opened it was found to contain also a protest or affidavit dated on the 25th. Is not that correct, and must not that envelope have been opened and the paper put in after it was received by the returning board?

Mr. GARFIELD. No, sir; if the gentleman will allow me, I will explain that matter. I was not present, but will state how I understood it from those who were present. One of the returns was brought by the supervisor to the city of New Orleans before he had inclosed it in the envelope and sealed it, it bearing the date when the return was made, and then after he arrived in New Orleans he there prepared his statement of intimidation, dating it in New Orleans of date when he prepared it, and when he had prepared that statement he enveloped it with the return and forwarded it to the board. That is the fact in regard to that matter as I understood it. If the man had intended fraud he certainly would have made the dates correspond, but the two papers dated a week apart were inclosed together at the same time, of course at the date of the last paper, in one envelope. If he had intended fraud this would have been too shallow a mode to perpetrate it.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Does not the law of Louisiana require that the local returning board shall seal up their statement of the vote cast in their precincts with wax, or wafer, or mucilage?

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman is now asking questions as to the law of Louisiana. He just charged forgery.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I state that the law is that they should seal up their returns at the time of preparing them. Therefore, the envelope in question must have been sealed before it was mailed and the fraud occurred afterward.

Mr. LYNDE. I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON.]

Mr. KASSON. At the expiration of the time given to me yesterday I had called the attention of the House to the fact that neither the committee nor any member of the House who had spoken had prescribed any limitations about the alleged power of the House of Representatives over State officers and State papers. No limitation has been suggested to the power claimed to bring them in evidence before a committee or to punish the officers for contempt for their non-production.

I have been listening to the debate this morning, anxious to learn if any gentleman, a member of the Judiciary Committee, or any member of the other side of the House, would state whether there was any boundary to the power of this House over the testimony to be required of any State officer, or over any State tribunal, for the production of papers at the demand of this House. No such limitation has been stated by any of the advocates of this report.

In looking at the report of the Judiciary Committee I read these words:

> Your committee do not feel called upon at this time to express an opinion upon the question as to whether the action of the returning officers is subject to review by any State or national tribunal.

Thus the committee have stated that they do not express an opinion that we have a right to review the action of the tribunal whose papers you require; and yet they are demanding all the original records and the documents of that tribunal to be brought here before this House by its committee. For what purpose, if not for a review, can that be done or be justified?

I have endeavored in this debate to call the attention of the House to the proper principle involved in the resolution. I have not referred to the transactions of fact in Louisiana, about which differences of opinion exist between the members of this House which are as wide as the poles apart. But I do demand of the lawyers on both sides to consider the principle on which they can base a right to bring this board of State officers here, and to compel them to bring the archives of that State here, taking them out of the jurisdiction of the State, to be held at the will of this House in the possession of the committee or of the House itself.

I denied the right yesterday, and asked for the principle upon which they could invade the State and seize the State officers and archives; and I have had no reply. Is it, then, that the House is unwilling to examine the principle involved? Having started wrong in this investigation, are we to continue wrong to the end?

Your original resolution empowered this committee to examine "into the recent elections in the States" named, not even confining its examination to the election of Federal officers. And under that resolution, which was forced through without opportunity by debate to show that it was a usurpation of power, that committee is authorized to examine into the election of every officer, parish or State, general or local, if they determine to interpret the resolution according to its terms.

Now look at the action under that resolution. The State officers have been required to bring before that committee the consolidated statement and tally-lists. On those very consolidated statements and tally-lists the constitution of the State Legislature of both pretended governments in Louisiana depend; and on them depend the election of all the parish officers of that State. When their law requires the State officers to make these reports so that the Legislature may have access to them, you propose to take the evidence of the title of every officer, whether of the Nicholls legislature or of the Packard legislature, away from the control and jurisdiction of the State.

It is said here that we ought to have the right "to inspect" these papers. They have never been known to refuse the demand for the "inspection" of the original papers. They have been "inspected" by both parties already. Do not gentlemen remember that the committee sent down in the interest of the democratic party had access to the original papers, which were passed down to them when first opened, and which were examined by them at their will? Have the committee of this House been refused the privilege of inspection of those papers? Not at all. It is a transfer of custody which has been refused, and rightly so.

This is a pure and naked demand for the production to an alien jurisdiction of original documents belonging to and required by the State of Louisiana. The resolution proposes to punish these State officers for nothing else than the technical contempt implied in the non-production of these State papers in the rooms of the committee; being claimed as evidence, the committee could have brought them to Washington. They appeared and testified. They offered certified copies of the papers; they have not refused an inspection of the original papers. But now, and under these circumstances, your resolution commands that they be arrested, brought out of their official jurisdiction, and punished in Washington for a contempt in not putting under the control of a committee of this House the archives of the State of Louisiana. This it proposes to do without any act of Congress giving us any right in the premises.

Sir, can the majority of this House of Representatives protect themselves from responsibility for this invasion of the rights of the State of Louisiana by referring to the original error committed by this House in its first resolution, as one gentleman [Mr. HURD] did claim this morning? There are some old lines to the effect that after you have gone wrongly into deep waters "to return were more tedious than go o'er." I fear that members of this House will hereafter find no other defense to their action that the tediousness of retracing wrong steps. I pray them now to consider whether they the have right to seize these papers of a State and bring them to Washington; and whether they have the right to seize also the State officers of Louisiana and bring them to Washington.

A few years hence and the majority in this House may be changed. There may be a government and a governor in Virginia into whose certificates of election that republican House of Congress may desire to inquire. Shall we have the right to take from the city of Richmond its governor and every State officer and all the archives of the State of Virginia and bring them here to Washington pending the organization of a State government in that State? Your principle goes to that extent, and there is no escape from your responsibility for the principle. I trust that gentlemen will yet inquire more seriously whether it is right than they do whether their party demands it.

An eminent member of the democratic party, and he is still an eminent member of that party, once said to me that every act of legislation and of a public officer ought to rest upon a principle; and only in so far as it rested upon correct principle was it worthy of support. The principle at the basis of the action proposed here is that this House of Congress alone has absolute control over State officers and State papers for the purpose of obtaining evidence touching State elections. That I still deny to-day, after further inquiry, as I denied yesterday. You may have the right by process of law to compel the production of certified copies of paper relating to matters within your jurisdiction if you provide for it by law, as you have provided by law for copies of judicial proceedings.

Gentlemen ask, have we not the right to inquire, as we have done heretofore, into the election of Congressmen? Yes. Why? Because we are by the Constitution the judges of the election of Representatives in Congress. Has not the Senate the right to inquire into the original action and records concerning the election of Senators? Yes; because the Senate is the judge of the returns and qualifications of its members.

But are we on this floor an electoral college? Are we so constituted as to be a returning board No. 2 to correct the action of returning board No. 1 for state electors and other State officers?

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. KASSON. Pardon me, I have not time. There is no such thing as a national electoral college. Mark the words, there is no such thing known to the Constitution as a national electoral college. There is not even an organized body of which these electors are members outside of their own State. There is no national body that can pass upon their qualifications prior to the exercise and end of their functions. It was never intended that their qualifications or regularity of appointment should be passed upon outside of the State, unless it be in regard to the particular points named in the Federal Constitution as constitutional disqualifications. This attempt on the part of one House of Congress to constitute itself a returning board outside of the Constitution, and after the officers have ceased to exist as such, is a usurpation of power, dangerous to the rights of States and to the future peace and welfare of the American Republic.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LYNDE. I now yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] for ten minutes.

Mr REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] has just told us that this House is not clothed with imperial powers. We might infer from his remarks and from those of his political associates that there was in this country no body which was omnipotent, irresponsible, and imperial, but a Louisiana returning board.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] warns us against the unconstitutionality and danger of seizing upon the State officers and State archives of Louisiana and bringing them before this House. The gentleman and others seem to forget that a republican Senate brought the same kind of officers and archives from Louisiana, before their committee here during last Congress, and these gentlemen made no complaint or protest against that. And the republican Senate has at this session brought the governor of Oregon before its committee, and these gentlemen have made no complaint or protest against that.

Mr. KASSON. There was no protest I believe; there was no issue made in either case by the State authorities.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, in the short time allowed me for the discussion of the question before the House, and without opportunity for careful preparation, I shall not be able to make a fair presentation of it.

We are within a few weeks of the time when Congress is required by the Constitution to count the electoral votes for President and Vice-President of the United States and declare the result.

The mode and manner of appointing electors is left by the Constitution to be determined by the States. The question as to who are electors must be determined by Congress.

It is insisted by some of the gentlemen who have spoken on the republican side that the States must and determine who are electors, and that Congress cannot inquire into that question; that, in the language of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE,] the action of the returning board is final and conclusive and this House has no power or authority to change the result. And this view is also sustained by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FRYE,] the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] and the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

I assume that in accordance with the unbroken line of precedents of ninety years, covering twenty-two elections for President and Vice-President of the United States and the whole period of the constitutional Government of the Union, Congress will count the electoral vote; that it will determine for itself who are electors and entitled to vote; and that for this purpose it will, if necessary, go behind the certificates of election and behind the action of returning boards to ascertain the will of the people as expressed by their votes.

In the election of Mr. Monroe in 1817 Congress went behind the certificate of election, and the acts of the returning officers of the election in the State of Indiana, to determine whether the electoral votes of that State should be counted. In the election of Mr. Monroe in 1821 Congress went behind the certificate of election, and the action of the returning officers of the State of Missouri, to determine whether the electoral votes of that State should be counted. In the election of Mr. Van Buren in 1837 Congress went behind the certificate of election, and the action of the returning officers of the State of Michigan, to determine whether the electoral votes of that State should be counted. And in that election a committee of three on the part of the Senate, consisting of Felix Grundy of Tennessee, Henry Clay of Kentucky, and Silas Wright of New York, in conjunction with a committee of five members of the House of Representatives, by order of the two Houses, went behind the certificates of election and behind the action of the returning officers of the States to ascertain whether electors had been chosen contrary to the prohibition contained in the second section of the second article of the Constitution. And that committee reported that they were "of opinion that the second section of the second article of the Constitution, which declares that 'no Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector,' ought to be carried in its whole spirit into rigid execution in order to prevent officers of the General Government from bringing their official power to influence the elections of President and Vice-President of the United States. This provision of the Constitution, it is believed, excludes and disqualifies deputy postmasters from the appointment of electors, and the disqualification relates to the time of the appointments, and that a resignation of the office of the deputy postmaster, after his appointment as elector, would not entitle him to vote as elector under the Constitution." And this opinion of these great Senators may be useful in our present troubles upon other questions than the one I am now considering.

In the election of Mr. Buchanan in 1857 Congress went behind the certificate of election and the action of the returning officers of the State of Wisconsin to determine whether the electoral votes of that State should be counted. In the election of Mr. Lincoln in 1865, Congress, with large republican majorities in both Houses, adopted the twenty-second joint rule for the government of the two Houses in counting the electoral votes for President and Vice-President of the United States, under which, in the election of that year, and in the election of General Grant in 1869, and again in 1873, Congress, upon deliberate consideration, went behind the certificates of election and the action of the returning officers of different States and excluded their electoral votes. And under this joint rule such electoral votes might be and were excluded by the objection of either House without the concurrence of the other. And if the law and facts require it to be done, I take it that the votes of States or of particular electors will be excluded by the objection of either House in this election, as they have been in past elections.

On this question of the right of Congress "to exclude from counting all electoral votes deemed by them illegal," I will read the special message of President Lincoln of February 10, 1865. It is as follows:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives:

The joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution declaring certain States not entitled to representation in the electoral college," has been signed by the Executive in deference to the view of Congress implied in its passage and presentation to him. In his own view, however, the two Houses of Congress, convened under the twelfth article of the Constitution, have complete power to exclude from counting all electoral votes deemed by them to be illegal; and it is not competent for the Executive to defeat or obstruct that power by a veto, as would be the case if his action were at all essential in the matter. He disclaims all right of the Executive to interfere in any way in the matter of canvassing or counting electoral votes; and he also disclaims that by signing said resolution he has expressed any opinion on the recitals of the preamble or any judgment of his own upon the subject of the resolution.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, February 8, 1865.

Our friends on the republican side show a new-born and wonderful zeal for the doctrine of State rights, which they have labored so earnestly for years past to try to render odious. In great kindness and charity, I suggest to them that I know gentlemen in this country who some years back got into very serious trouble on account of their devotion to the doctrine of State rights. But I will express the hope that these gentlemen may be more fortunate. They manifest on this occasion a holy horror at the idea of the Federal Government interfering in elections in the States. And yet it is that party that introduced into the Constitution of the United States in the last few years, for the first time in the history of the Government, provisions in relation to the rights of citizens to vote in the States. It is that party which has in the last few years, for the first time in the history of the Government, passed elaborate acts of Congress to regulate and protect the rights of citizens to vote in the several States. It is that party which provided for and appoints supervisors of elections in the States by the Federal Government. It is that party which, by its Attorney-General, with the sanction of its President and his Cabinet, and with the approval of the republicans of the Senate and this House, appoints an army of deputy marshals, to be paid out of the Federal Treasury, to manage and control elections in the States for the worst of partisan purposes; and who, to this end, were authorized to use the Army of the United States in controlling such elections, without any demand by the States, as provided for in the Constitution, for such troops, and when there was no legitimate necessity for them. It is this party which, through its President, with the sanction of his Cabinet, and with approval of the republican Senators and members and Representatives and of the great body of the party, openly employs the Army of the United States to overthrow lawful civil State governments, formed by the will of the people, and substitutes in their place other governments in the States which have no other authority for their existence than what is derived from military orders and the unlawful and unconstitutional use of the Army; and which openly and notoriously uses the Army of the United States to overawe and intimidate the people and to carry elections, both Federal and State.

This is the party which has so holy a horror now of the interference of the Federal Government with elections in the States; when, too, it is at this very moment using the Army of the United States to keep out of office governors and other State officers, State senators and representatives, and district and county officers in two States, which were elected by the people, and to put into their places by force and fraud those who were defeated by the people.

When these gentlemen tell us that the work of the returning boards, such as that in Louisiana, are conclusive, and cannot be impeached or inquired into even for fraud and for being in violation of law, do they forget that they have been, without objection or protest, trying cases of contested seats of members of this House from that State at every Congress since the disgraceful election laws and infamous returning board of that State had an existence; and that in each case they were going behind the action of this returning board, and treating it, as it ought to be treated, as furnishing by its action a prima facie case of election only, which may be rightfully inquired into by this House, and which has been so inquired into by this House, and the action of the Louisiana returning board set aside on different occasions, and the true result of the election by the people announced by this House? It is remarkable that these gentlemen cannot understand a principle which is as old as the law of elections, and firmly established by almost countless precedents, that an election by the people is determined by the votes of the people, and that the returns of the officers of such election are only prima facie the evidence of an election, and may always be set aside for fraud or illegality, and the true result announced. Fraud vitiates everything; a solemn deed or the record of the highest court will be annulled, set aside, held for naught, if made or procured by fraud.

The committee in the report under consideration say in substance that public rumor charges fraud in the Louisiana election. It is proposed to investigate this fraud. We know from newspaper reports, and from the statements of both citizens and officers, that a democratic majority of more than 8,000 has been by that returning board converted into a republican majority of more than 3,000. We wish to know just how this was done; and the whole country wishes to know how it was done, and has a right to know how it was done, as it may determine the result of the election of President and Vice-President of the United States.

And yet republican members on this floor—representatives of a part of the American people—distinguished for their ability and public experience, tell us that even if this returning board has been guilty of fraud and of unlawful conduct, though it may be leprous with fraud, a stench in the nostrils of all honest men, and a hissing and by-word throughout Christendom, still its frauds are so sacred, so inviolable, so beyond the reach of honest men, good morals, and sound principles of law, that it must outweigh the honest votes of more than four millions of freemen, in a Government created, upheld, and perpetuated so far by public opinion, as made known through the lawful votes of the people, as contradistinguished from a government created, upheld, and perpetuated by either force or fraud.

This position is so monstrous that I am persuaded gentlemen who are driven into it by partisan heat or supposed political exigencies will, in after and calmer times, be amazed that they should have avowed such doctrines.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] and several of his brethren have made or attempted to make the issue that we could not go into the States and seize State officers, acting under State laws, and State records and bring them before this House or its committee, without violating the Constitution and trampling down State rights. I suggest that such an issue is not presented by the report before us, and that therefore we need not discuss or decide it. The duty is devolved on Congress to count the electoral votes for President and Vice-President of the United States. Our authority to do so is derived from the Constitution of the United States. And these are the higher officers of the Government of the United States. They are not State officers. We are not State officers. The only warrant for our action is that Constitution. In the performance of this great duty are we to accept fraudulent and illegal acts of a returning board whose infamy is both national and world-wide, without inquiry, as binding on us? Or are we to inquire for the very truth? The common-sense, natural, reasonable American way is to inquire for the very truth. To do this we must authorize our committee to purge the consciences of the members of that board, and to examine the poll-books, returns, &c., on which their action was based, and whether that action was in accordance with law and is sustained by the facts. That board not only spirited away a democratic majority of over eight thousand and give to their party a majority of over three thousand, but their final and most important action in doing it was in secret. The law of their existence required that the board should be composed of members of all political parties. It should have consisted of five members; but in fact did only have four members, and these were all republicans. They were applied to repeatedly to fill the vacancy by the appointment of a democrat, which they refused to do, under the sham pretense that they were equally divided on the question as to whether they should fill it. It looks like they had determined to perpetrate a great fraud, and resorted to subterfuge and trick to prevent any democrat from witnessing and exposing that fraud.

The gentlemen who take this extraordinary position as to the sanctity and sacredness of the acts of a fraudulent returning board seem to loose their reckoning in many respects. Suppose two returns come from one State—and we are advised that there will be duplicate returns from four or five States in this election—we must use our judgment and discretion, we must determine, decide in each case which is the true and proper return, which contains the true vote of the people and is presented by the proper electors, and with the proper authentication. We must, if necessary, go behind the returns themselves, and behind the action of the returning officers, to determine this. So returns may be made, as in the election of Mr. Van Buren in 1837, of persons who appear to have been elected as electors, but who are ineligible; and we may now as then have to go behind the returns to determine this, and to prevent persons from voting for President and Vice-President who are not permitted by the Constitution to be electors.

But I will not multiply the instances in which, from the very necessity of the case, we may have to go behind the returns and behind the action of returning boards in the discharge of the high duty we owe to the whole people to see honestly and fairly that those elected by them shall be declared by us to have been elected. And no fraud, no illegality, no trick or subterfuge, must stand in the way of common honesty, plain duty, and obedience to law in this respect. We want the truth and the whole truth about this election. This cannot be reached without compelling the witnesses named to testify and to produce their records and books for inspection of the committee. I do not doubt our jurisdiction for this purpose. Surely this great body, clothed with jurisdiction over the subject, has as much power to compel witnesses to testify and to produce papers as a district or county court in one of the States or Territories or of the District of Columbia.

But it is insisted that villainy has invented a contrivance in Louisiana which not only sanctifies fraud and illegality, but binds our consciences, and defies our authority and powers in counting and declaring the result of the electoral vote. It is said the Legislature of that State has clothed the board with judicial powers, and has declared its action binding and final on all elections. I must insist that in common justice and by all law it is only binding and final when it is in accordance with law and is free from fraud. Its action is not and cannot be more binding, final, and conclusive than a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, and even a judgment of that august tribunal would be set aside and annulled if after it is made it should be found that the court had no jurisdiction of the case, or that its judgment had been obtained by fraud, or had been the result of accident or mistake. The law makes the judgments and decrees of this great court final and conclusive as to the parties to the litigation, and they may be set aside, annulled, for fraud or for want of jurisdiction; but yet we are gravely asked to agree that the doings of this fraudulent returning board, under a law which was designed as a cheat and swindle, has more sanctity than such a judgment or decree. Can folly go further or presumption become more audacious than this?

Mr. LAWRENCE. The gentleman from Texas has alluded to me. I desire to quote in relation to the New York election, to which I referred in my remarks yesterday, the following. Alexander Hamilton wrote to Rufus King, July 25, 1792:

> To rejudge the decision of the canvassers by a convention has to me too much the appearance of reversing the sentence of a court by a legislative decree. The canvassers had a final authority in all the forms of the Constitution and laws. A question arose in the execution of their office not absolutely free from difficulty, which they have decided. I am persuaded, wrongly, but within the power vested in them. I do not feel it right or expedient to attempt to reverse the decision by any means not known to the Constitution or laws. The precedent may suit us to-day, but to-morrow we may rue its abuse.—Hamilton's History of the Republic, volume 5, page 29.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LYNDE] has now remaining ten minutes of the time allowed by order of the House.

Mr. LYNDE. I yield that time to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.]

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I would not trouble the House again on this question but for the request of my distinguished friend from Wisconsin, [Mr. LYNDE.] I rise to close the debate and to call the previous question. In so far as this matter is a legal proposition, it lies in a nutshell. It has been abundantly, exhaustively discussed. Thus far in the discussion no proposition has yet been made or sustained on the other side which would negative the power of this House to call for records of this peculiar character and have them properly inspected. If a crime like forgery is alleged to have been committed, and the forged paper is in the place where the criminal is to be tried, no lawyer will deny that a subpœna duces tecum will reach the original paper. That is the proposition, in effect, which is presented here. That is the object of the process of this House, contumaciously disregarded by the returning board of Louisiana. That this House has plenary power over this object will not be disputed by any one who recognizes the functions of Congress and the mode and means of intelligent legislation and action under the Constitution. Why, sir, has it not been contended on the other side of the House, as in the Kilbourn case at the last session, and notably by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR,] that Congress is paramount; that it is a high court of supreme jurisdiction, even to the restraint of persons, as well as in the production of papers? If this be so, then we have the power and the right to pursue this matter where the integrity of an electoral college is concerned. So as to the spoliation of records, the same rule will obtain.

But gentlemen on the other side have misstated the facts. This Louisiana committee have not called, as has been stated, for papers to be brought outside of Louisiana. They have not called for anything except the inspection of these records. Gentlemen say, "O, we tender you copies." But then these very inculpated parties propose that they themselves and no one else shall make the copies! They propose to do the copying when we are investigating the charge of spoliation, fraud, or forgery! That will not do, sir; for the forgery or mutilation of returns or records does not appear in mere transcripts.

Why, Mr. Speaker, this matter of enforcing the production of the records was really concluded when this House resolved to investigate. The right to investigate, which was conceded on both sides, which has been conceded in the Senate—the right to investigate into the election for congressmen or electors includes, ex necessitate rei, the right to send for persons and papers. That position cannot be successfully denied. Gentlemen who favored investigation are estopped from denying the right of the House to pursue all the usual modes of investigation. The process of duces tecum is one of them; and such process is specially applicable to election records when the examination is directed to that subject.

Why then do gentlemen opposite, professing their great desire for investigation before the American people on this momentous question connected with our Chief Magistracy, on the threshold of its determination by the House, seek at this time to stifle investigation by benumbing or destroying the very agencies to be employed?

It has come directly to this. I do not discuss now the law or the facts; I speak of the morale. Here to-day gentlemen on the other side are in the position of choking down the truth. Not that they would just now count one man in and another out; but they estop inquiry at this perilous juncture as to the proper man to be counted in. Do gentlemen desire to anticipate the work of the 14th of February? Do they desire to smother what is indispensable to be known, and known at once? Do they desire to assist in concealment for ulterior purposes?

Thus, sir, this question has its importance, not merely as a question of public law. It is the pivotal question on which the Chief Magistracy depends. On it hang stupendous consequences. Yet we are met by frivolous debate as to the change of parties on State rights or federalism; and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] condescended to intimate that democrats had become federalists, while his side had become devoted to State rights. Sir, we have not come down from the position of State-rights men. We stand within the Constitution, which is the barrier by which the rights of the States are protected. The allusion of my friend from Massachusetts to the fable narrated by Macaulay, of the serpent and the man, whose various parts in a conflict were transformed and interchanged, does not apply, either as analogy or reason, to this proposition. We stand as ever by the rights of the States. We stand by the power of this House to guard the existence of a State. Who would strike down State rights here? Ah! are gentlemen on the other side upholding by their opposition to this measure of coercion the power of the State militia, or of the State courts, or of the State laws and constitution of Louisiana? Are they defending its autonomy, its independence, its freedom, threatened hourly by the federal bayonet, who champion not merely the old federalism, but a federalism intensified and arbitrary, and backed up by the insolence of the military? You would dethrone State rights; we would enthrone them. You have already by your Gatling guns and other forceful means stricken down the State. By the unlawful exercise of Federal power, by your pronunciamientos, by your perversion of the muniments of liberty in that State, by defying the Constitution, by stretching forth in the State of Louisiana the velvety gloved hand of power with iron grip underneath it, you have murdered State rights; and you cannot even be allowed to preach the funeral oration. [Laughter and applause.]

Why, Mr. Speaker, when gentlemen on the other side appland State rights, let them go to Louisiana; let them see a stricken State, with the Federal power over its prostrate form. Why, the very sugar-plantations are turned into swamps, and the former habitations of health, plenty, and content are filled with crawling serpents—evidences of ruthless wrong and premature decay. It is no longer the proud State of Louisiana which Jefferson bought and of which the democracy were so proud. It lies in the dust at the feet of fraud and force. As a fable from Macaulay has been sent up to be read as presenting an appropriate analogy in connection with this debate, I ask to have read another story which has more appropriate application. It comes nearer to the point of this debate, if such fabulous allusions be applicable at all. I ask the Clerk to read a passage which is also from Macaulay.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Ariosto tells a pretty story of a fairy, who, by some mysterious law of her nature, was condemned to appear at certain seasons in the form of a foul and poisonous snake. Those who injured her during the period of her disguise were forever excluded from participation in the blessings which she bestowed. But to those who, in spite of her loathsome aspect, pitied and protected her, she afterward revealed herself in the beautiful and celestial form which was natural to her, accompanied their steps, granted all their wishes, filled their houses with wealth, made them happy in love and victorious in war. Such a spirit is liberty. At times she takes the form of a hateful reptile; she grovels, she hisses, she stings. But woe to those who in disgust shall venture to crush her; and happy are those who, having dared to receive her in her degraded and frightful shape, shall at length be rewarded by her in the time of her beauty and glory.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, that fable by Macaulay illustrates the condition of Louisiana. She is condemned for a season to wear the pitiable and loathsome aspect. But woe to those who seek further to crush her, for they crush the beautiful form and spirit of liberty.

I remember well an interview which many years ago, just before the war, I had with General Cass. It was just before he left the Cabinet. He told me that when he had been a citizen of Ohio, residing at Marietta, and when Louisiana belonged to Spain, there was some difficulty about our northern and western produce, even as far up as Pennsylvania, passing down the great rivers and reaching the Gulf or the ocean. The Spaniards had a port of deposit at New Orleans and endeavored to impose ruinous exactions. What was done by the hardy pioneers? Flat-boats were manned with riflemen several thousand strong, to move down the Ohio and Mississippi to fight their way to the Gulf, because Louisiana belonged by the fiat of nature to the United States of America. This adventure was only foiled by the timely transfer of Louisiana to France, and from France to the United States.

Does she belong to us yet? Have we indeed a State there at all, or a double-headed State? Or is it anarchy? No, Mr. Speaker, though she lies prostrate she is still ours. Her rights and honor are ours. She is just as necessary now to the great West, to the North, to the whole country, as she ever was, and she is entitled to have a potential voice in determining for this people who shall be the Chief Executive, and assisting our material and political unity and destiny. Let us not allow that voice to be despised or throttled, but let us carry out by the authority of Congress, the wish and voice of her people, for liberty, for peace, for honesty, for democracy, for Samuel J. Tilden. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced the passage of the following House bills without amendments:

An act (H. R. No. 2287) for the relief of Peters & Reed, naval contractors at Norfolk navy-yard in the year 1860;

An act (H. R. No. 2842) granting a pension to Robert S. Toland;

An act (H. R. No. 3500) granting a pension to Nelson Ainslie;

An act (H. R. No. 2653) making an appropriation for the improvement and repair of the military road between Springfield and Fort Randall, in the Territory of Dakota;

An act (H. R. No. 2242) granting a pension to George McColly;

An act (H. R. No. 1521) granting a pension to Louis A. McLaughlin; and

An act (H. R. No. 940) for the relief of Edwin Ebert.

It further announced the passage of the following joint resolution with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 181) authorizing the Public Printer to bind in cloth the reserved and stitched copies of the House compilation entitled Counting the Electoral Vote.

It further announced the passage of the following bills, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (S. No. 1123) granting a pension to Marsilvia F. Woodard, mother of George R. Woodard;

An act (S. No. 1118) granting a pension to Mrs. Amy King;

An act (S. No. 949) for the relief of A. M. Garountte, late captain and assistant quartermaster, United States Army;

An act (S. No. 947) for the relief of the estate of Jacob Senseney, of Winchester, Virginia;

An act (S. No. 931) for the relief of H. H. Mathews, of Arkansas; and

An act (S. No. 109) for the relief of the estate of I. M. Micow, of the State of Alabama.

RECUSANT WITNESSES—LOUISIANA RETURNING BOARD.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on the adoption of the resolution reported from the Committee on the Judiciary by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. LYNDE.]

Mr. KASSON demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 158, nays 81, not voting 51; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ainsworth, Ashe, Atkins, Bagby, John H. Bagley, jr., Banning, Bell, Bland, Bliss, Blount, Boone, Bradford, Bright, John Young Brown, Buckner, Samuel D. So the resolution was adopted.

During the call of the roll the following announcements were made:

Mr. CABELL. My colleague from Virginia, Mr. HUNTON, is absent on the joint committee of the House and Senate in relation to counting the electoral vote. He desires, if in order, to have his vote recorded in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must be present in order to have his vote recorded.

Mr. EDEN. My colleague from Illinois, Mr. SPRINGER, is also absent, serving on the joint committee in regard to counting the electoral vote. If present, he would vote "ay."

Mr. KASSON. My colleague from Iowa, Mr. MCCRARY, is absent on the joint committee in relation to counting the electoral vote, sitting by leave of the House. If present, he would vote "no."

Mr. FRYE. The gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. HOAR, is absent on the same joint committee.

Mr. LEAVENWORTH. My colleague from New York, Mr. HATHORN, is detained by sickness, and my colleague, Mr. PLATT, is absent by leave of the House.

Mr. STRAIT. My colleague from Minnesota, Mr. DUNNELL, is absent by reason of sickness.

Mr. JOHN REILLY. My colleague from Pennsylvania, Mr. JAMES B. REILLY, is absent by leave of the House.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. LYNDE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 767) for the relief of Samuel B. Stauber and others; and

An act (H. R. No. 4155) amending the act of July 28, 1876, entitled "An act for the relief of Kendrick & Avis, Kuner, Zisemann & Zott, Kuner & Zott, all of Saint Louis, Missouri, and Nachtrieb & Co., of Galion, Ohio."

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FOSTER. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations to report back the bill (H. R. No. 4307) making appropriations to supply certain deficiencies in the contingent fund of the House of Representatives, and for other purposes, with amendments by the Senate. I ask that the report of the committee may be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4307) making appropriations to supply certain deficiencies in the contingent fund of the House of Representatives, and for other purposes, together with the amendments of the Senate thereto, having considered the same beg leave to report as follows:

The committee recommend concurrence in the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 13, 15, and 16.

The committee recommend non-concurrence in the amendments numbered 7 and 14.

The committee recommend concurrence in the amendment numbered 12, with an amendment as follows:

Strike out lines 17, 18, 19, and 20, on page 3 of the bill, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

For miscellaneous items, and to defray the actual necessary expenses of the committee making the investigations ordered by direction of the House, and to pay expenses necessarily incurred in connection therewith, $33,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary; $24,456.39 of which shall be exclusively applied to pay fees of witnesses summoned before committees of the House, and other expenses incident to investigations not otherwise provided for. That the members of committees directed to make investigations at points other than the capital shall only be paid their actual and necessary traveling expenses while engaged in the performance of said duties.

The SPEAKER. The amendments in which the committee recommend concurrence will be read seriatim.

The Clerk read the amendments in which the committee recommended concurrence, and they were severally concurred in.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now read the amendments, numbers 7 and 14, in which the committee recommend non-concurrence.

The amendments were read, and were non-concurred in.

The SPEAKER. The committee recommend concurrence in the twelfth amendment of the Senate with an amendment.

The twelfth amendment of the Senate and the proposed amendment of the Committee on Appropriations were read.

Mr. FORT. I would like to have the gentleman who makes this report give some explanation about the failure to report an appropriation for the contingent expenses of this House.

Mr. FOSTER. The bill as it passed the House provided an appropriation of $21,000 for contingent expenses, $13,000 of which might be used for the purposes of investigation. Since that time the committee is informed officially that it will cost about $60,000 to defray the expenses of the various committees ordered by the present House. Thirty-five thousand dollars of this sum has already been appropriated. There remains yet to be paid on this account, on the account of the expenditures of these committees, about $25,000. The committee, therefore, have increased the appropriation from $21,000 to $33,000 under the impression that a portion, at least $12,000 of the $21,000, might be used for this additional expenditure incurred on account of investigating committees. This will reduce the $21,000 to $8,000; that is to say, if the $21,000 is paid on account of the expenditures of these committees, there will be left in the contingent fund $8,000.

Mr. FORT. What I desire to be informed about is this: How much money will be subject to the order of the Committee of Accounts to pay the contingent expenses which have already accrued?

Mr. FOSTER. About $8,000. That is, to pay all the liabilities of the House on account of previous expenditures for investigations and the ordinary contingent expenses of the House. In other words, the $8,000 is in lieu of the $21,000 that we voted when the bill passed the House originally.

Mr. HOLMAN. As the bill originally passed the House, as my colleague on the committee from Ohio says, the whole amount appropriated for contingent expenses of the House was $21,000, $13,000 of which was to be applied to the payment of witness fees and other expenses in making investigations. It was ascertained afterward that perhaps instead of $13,000 a little over $24,000 would be required, and we added the $8,000 to the ordinary contingent fund, making in round numbers $33,000.

Mr. FORT. But perhaps the whole sum may be swallowed up by those who are now abroad engaged in these investigations, leaving an insufficient sum for the ordinary expenses of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. Twenty-four thousand five hundred and sixty-six dollars is liable for that purpose, and I understand that within the knowledge of the Clerk there are drafts for less than $3,000 now due, which would be a charge upon the ordinary contingent fund of the House. The contingent fund is a mere bagatelle.

Mr. ROBERTS. The gentleman from Indiana suggests that these matters which have previously passed the Committee of Accounts are mere matters of bagatelle. I desire to call his attention to the kind of bagatelle. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOLMAN. O, no! I hope the gentleman will quote my language aright. I say that the amount of claims upon the contingent fund is a mere bagatelle.

Mr. ROBERTS. I will show the gentleman what bagatelle means in this sense. Already there have passed through the Committee of Accounts, receiving the indorsement of that committee as claims certainly proper to be paid, accounts to the amount of nearly $3,000. That may be a mere bagatelle, but there are other accounts to the amount of upward of $2,000 pending before the committee, many of which, in the opinion of the committee, ought to be paid. And I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that many accounts of this nature are referred to the Committee of Accounts and passed by that committee and are not paid because the contingent fund is insufficient. The arrangement which the gentleman from Indiana or the Committee on Appropriations have now made is practically a wiping out of the appropriation of $8,000 generously voted by the House when this measure was before it. That is the practical effect of the bill as now reported, and I desire the House to understand it and vote on it knowingly, and if they do so and are satisfied with doing so, I shall be satisfied.

Mr. CLYMER. I am certain that the chairman of the Committee of Accounts is laboring under a misapprehension as to the true condition of affairs under the proposed amendment to this bill. When the bill was originally under consideration the sum of $21,000 was appropriated to meet certain expenses, $13,000 of which was to be appropriated to investigating committees and $8,000 to the contingent expenses of the House. That was the provision of the bill as it passed. The bill went to the Senate and came back here and was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and it was discovered that $12,000 more would be needed for the expenses of the investigating committees. We have therefore increased the appropriation of $27,000 to $35,000, $25,000 of which is to be applied to the investigating committees, leaving $8,000 for the purposes indicated by the chairman of the Committee of Accounts. And the bill, so far as regards those expenses, will be precisely in the same condition as when it passed in the original.

Mr. ROBERTS. I have not the slightest objection to that if the gentleman will so phrase the bill as that the $8,000 shall be separate and apart from the amount appropriated for investigating committees. If he will so word it that $25,000 shall be appropriated for investigations and the balance of $8,000 shall be for the contingent fund of the House, then I am willing to assent to it.

Mr. CLYMER. The estimate of the expenses which will have to be defrayed for the investigating committees is $60,000. We have already appropriated $35,000 for that, to which we add the $25,000 appropriated in this bill, and which will leave $8,000 from this item for the ordinary contingent expenses of the House, and there are not claims for more than $3,000 now before the Committee of Accounts unpaid. It seems to me that the chairman of the Committee of Accounts will find that the amount appropriated in this bill is an ample fund.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. ROBERTS] and of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FORT] to the fact that the $8,000 appropriated by the bill for the contingent fund of the House remains untouched by this amendment and stands as it was in the original bill.

The only effect of this amendment is to increase the appropriation for the investigating committee from $13,000 to $25,000. I will say a word further. We appropriate $60,000 for the contingent fund of the House for the current year, and there must be some reasonable limit to these ordinary expenditures of the House of Representatives. I hope the gentleman will not insist upon appropriating more than the $8,000.

Mr. FORT. I understand the gentleman still to say that it is estimated that the investigating committees will expend $60,000 and they have an appropriation of that sum. But he does not know but what their expenses will exceed that sum; and, if so, it will use up the entire amount appropriated.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the gentleman is confident that the sum he intends to go to the Committee of Accounts to be distributed by the committee is sufficient, is he willing now to strike out that provision which provides for payments specifically to the superintendent of the folding-room, and will he allow that gentleman to take his chances with others in receiving his pay out of this $8,000? There are other gentlemen interested in getting their pay, and the Committee on Appropriations had been careful to provide specifically for some persons, and if the appropriation is not sufficient to pay them all, then those specific appropriations should be stricken out. There are no specific appropriations except those based on resolutions of the House.

Mr. FORT. Why, then, is a special provision made for the superintendent of the folding-room?

Mr. HOLMAN. He is provided for in the regular appropriation bill. All the specific appropriations are based upon estimates from the proper officers of the Government. The Committee on Appropriations never appropriates a dollar of money except upon some estimate from some officer of the Government. When the House adopts a resolution for the appointment of a new officer, then a provision has to be made for him in the appropriation bill; but we are informed by the Clerk of the House that he believes that $2,500 will cover all the claims now existing against this fund of $8,000. And he estimates that there may be various other sums chargeable upon the contingent fund of the House.

But I wish to impress upon the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FORT] these two facts: first, that this bill stands just as it did when it passed the House, except that the amount to be available for the expenses of our investigating committees is increased from $13,000 to $25,000 and upward; secondly, I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FORT] and also the chairman of the Committee of Accounts [Mr. ROBERTS] to the fact that for years it has not been deemed a sound policy to have any large sum of money appropriated to the contingent fund of either branch of Congress. I remember the time when that was the policy; but I know that it was regarded as a very unwise policy and it has long since been abandoned. Of course gentlemen know that any accounts allowed and found to be proper charges against the contingent fund will be provided for in the regular appropriation bill.

Mr. ROBERTS. I move to amend the pending amendment by adding the following:

Provided, further, That $8,000 of this sum may be used for purposes other than those relating to investigation.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope that amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. ROBERTS. The remark the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] has just let fall illustrates his good faith toward the House in regard to this $8,000. If that sum is to be used for purposes outside of investigations, for the various items that come before the Committee of Accounts, then why not provide specifically that it shall be used for those purposes and none other?

I desire to say for the information of the House that, although we have proceeded but a few weeks into this session, there have already been presented to the Committee of Accounts claims which aggregate not less than $5,000, and which must be paid out of this $8,000. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] to some items, and if he will suggest that they be abolished, then I will consent to it. For instance, there is quite an account for ice. If the gentleman is prepared to do without ice and will obtain an order to that effect, then there will be no more ice bought hereafter.

Another item is for compiling the interesting book in relation to the electoral count. Then there are other items, which aggregate a very large sum of money. If the House is prepared to assent to these reductions, I certainly have no objection.

A considerable sum is required for the purchase of brooms, another sum is required for the purchase of soap, and still another sum for the washing of towels. Now, if all these matters can be dispensed with, and each individual member be required to purchase his own soap and to bring with him his own towel, I very cheerfully assent to it.

I desire to call the attention of the House to these facts, but I do not like upon every occasion when these little matters of contest arise here to be compelled to bring into the House our dirty linen and have it washed in public. I sincerely trust the amendment I have offered will be adopted.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. ROBERTS.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to say a word. I do not understand exactly what the gentleman means by "good faith to the House."

Mr. ROBERTS. My meaning is this——

Mr. HOLMAN. I certainly can be no more interested in the question of economy in the expenditures of this House than the gentleman from Maryland. Indeed, I should think he would be more so, from the example of public trust and confidence in this same field of economy which has been presented to him. I should think that from that example my friend would see the propriety of creating no motive for a raid upon the fund more immediately under his control. The attention of the country was everywhere arrested by the attack of his own committee during the last session of Congress upon these small items of expenditure, and which attracted the attention of the country not so much on account of their magnitude, but as indicating a disposition in small matters to encroach upon the Treasury of the Government. During the last session of Congress the Committee of Accounts obtained a national reputation on account of its severe economy; so much so, that the body of the people having the first opportunity promoted the head of that committee to the highest office in his State.

Now, as to the question of good faith, I have stated that this provision will stand now just as exactly as it did when the bill passed the House, except that the fund available for the expenses of our committees is increased from $13,000 to $25,000, leaving the $8,000 in the exact condition it was in when the bill passed the House.

Mr. ROBERTS. Provided it does not require more than $25,000 to pay the expenses of the investigating committees of this House.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman wants to add a new condition to the bill as it passed the House. I ask him, in the interest of fair, reasonable economy, not to insist upon a large contingent fund of this House, subject to be controlled by simple resolutions of the House. I do not believe that is a good policy. I think that every item which his committee may discover to be a legitimate charge against the Government, unless it is some very simple matter that should be provided for out of a small contingent fund, ought to be a subject of a specific appropriation. And for one, as a member of the Committee on Appropriations, I should very cheerfully concur in the incorporation of specific charges that may be reported by the Committee of Accounts into the proper appropriation bill yet to come before the House. But I trust that he will not embarrass the provision of the bill by this amendment. I will concede that the bill does contain an appropriation of $8,000 as a contingent fund, although the Clerk of the House has informed the committee that he is not aware of demands upon that fund to the extent of more than $5,000.

Mr. ROBERTS. When the bill was last before the House did not the gentleman himself suggest a provision of precisely the same character as that I have presented, in order to make specific the amount to be expended for these investigations; and was not that done simply that the sum so appropriated might not be used for any other purpose?

Mr. HOLMAN. The provision now stands just exactly as it passed the committee, with the exception of an increase of the fund applicable for paying the expenses of these investigations.

Mr. ROBERTS. I desire to say that these matters of accounts have been recurring from time to time; and I believe it is strictly within the line of economy that a proper sum should be placed at the disposal of the Committee of Accounts, the distribution of which will of course be regulated by resolutions which must have the approval of the House, and I assure the gentleman that the Committee of Accounts will give careful and proper consideration to all such resolutions.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the gentleman from Maryland will learn after further experience that a provision of this kind on such a measure as this is not the wisest policy; that the appropriation of any considerable sum of money at any time for the contingent fund of the House, unless in anticipation of items to be immediately paid, is not wise. But I will not antagonize the views of the gentleman's committee.

Mr. ROBERTS. Let me say one word more. In presenting this amendment I simply carry out that which I believe to be the will of the House as expressed when this bill was last under consideration.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, let us look at this amendment to see what is its effect. It provides that $8,000 of this appropriation may be used for purposes other than those connected with these investigations. Now, it is estimated that it will take $25,000 to pay the expenses of the four investigating committees ordered by this House. It is the estimate of the Clerk of the House that from $5,000 to $10,000 of old warrants for witness fees, which have been hawked about this city for six months and sold at a discount, are outstanding, and these must be unprovided for if this $8,000 is diverted to other purposes. You have allowed witnesses to go and sell their warrants at 25 per cent. discount. I venture to say that when the record is made up, this will prove to be the most extravagant House of Representatives that this country has seen for twenty years. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOLMAN. Now, Mr. Speaker, if my friend from Maryland wants to discuss the subject of good faith, I wish he would ask my friend from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] why he has not thrown himself across the track of this "extravagant" House of Representatives, which is going to prove itself "the most extravagant of any for twenty years."

Mr. FOSTER. I have been doing so continually.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would like my friend to point out the instance.

Mr. FOSTER. O, I have not time now. We have obtained a little cheap reputation on the lemonade question by going over to the Senate and drinking their lemonade. I do not know anything else in which we have made a saving. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust my friend from Ohio will remember that the late chairman of the Committee of Accounts is not now present. [Laughter.]

Mr. FOSTER. I have taken advantage of that.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand a letter from the Clerk on the subject of this appropriation. It is not a large item, I admit, but I wish it to be understood. I want to show my friend from Ohio that no vouchers of this House have been hawked about the streets; that every dollar of money which has been authorized by law has been appropriated. The appropriation for the current year was an ample and liberal appropriation, though I admit the amount is lower than what has been usually appropriated; and if the gentleman from Maryland is true to his trust, as I know he will be, the gentleman from Ohio will at the end of this session have to take back some of the utterances he has made to-day.

The Clerk says:

In answer to the written inquiry of your committee of the 15th instant as to amount appropriated during present session for expenses of investigating committees of the House, and the disposition of same, I have the honor to state that the amount appropriated during present session for the purpose named is $35,000, all of which has been paid to the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House in accordance with the requirements of the act of December 23, 1876, making said appropriation, upon the written order of chairmen of committees, as follows:

Louisiana committee	$16,500
South Carolina committee	8,500
Florida committee	6,000
New York and Philadelphia committee	4,000
Making a total of	35,000

This office has positive knowledge of accounts of this character amounting to $2,500, and it is estimated that an equal amount is outstanding and in the possession of the claimants of which this office has no positive information, making whole amount of outstanding accounts against contingent fund at this time for which no provision has been made reach the probable sum of $5,000.

Now that $5,000 will have to be paid, of course, out of this $8,000; and there are six weeks of this session yet to run. I know that the charge of extravagance could fairly be made against this House if, independently of the expenses for investigation, these mere bagatelles of expenditure should require an appropriation of $8,000.

I know that, and I know my friend from Ohio, if he is in earnest in trying to prevent this House making a bad contrast with its predecessors, will see no such considerable sum of money shall be subject to a simple resolution of the House. I now call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. ROBERTS's amendment to the amendment was agreed to, and the amendment, as amended, was concurred in.

Mr. FOSTER moved to reconsider the votes just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DEFECTIVE ENTRIES OF LAND.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Judiciary Committee, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 4315) for the relief of the holders of defective entries of land.

Mr. PAGE. I ask that the bill may be read so we may know what it is.

The bill was read in extenso.

Mr. PAGE. I must object unless I can have some explanation of this bill.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I will be glad to explain it.

The SPEAKER. That will bring the bill before the House for action.

Mr. PAGE. Then I must object unconditionally.

ARMY BLANKETS FOR DISTRICT REFORM SCHOOL.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

The joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to supply blankets to the Reform School in the District of Columbia is before me.

I am in entire sympathy with the purpose of the resolution, but before taking any action upon it I deem it my duty to submit for your consideration the accompanying letter received from the Secretary of War, embodying a report made in anticipation of the passage of the resolution by the Quartermaster-General of the Army, in which, among other facts, it is stated that "the appropriation for clothing for the Army for this fiscal year is much smaller than usual, and the supply of blankets which it will allow us to purchase is so small that none can properly be spared for other purposes than the supply of the Army.

"If it be thought by Congress worth while to cause the supply of blankets for the institution referred to to be procured through the War Department, it is respectfully suggested that provision to meet the expense be made by special appropriation."

U. S. GRANT.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, January 15, 1877.

Mr. STEVENSON. I move that the message and accompanying paper be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

VETO MESSAGE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

The Clerk read as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

For the reasons set forth in the accompanying communication addressed to the Secretary of the Interior by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, I have the honor to return herewith without my signature the bill (H. R. No. 2041) entitled "An act to amend section 2291 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in relation to proof required in homestead entries."

U. S. GRANT.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, January 15, 1877.

The message was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in relation to the management of the Louisville and Portland Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

DESTRUCTION OF HALLETT'S POINT REEF, NEW YORK.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report on the destruction of the reef at Hallett's Point, Hell Gate; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

IMPROVEMENT OF FOX AND WISCONSIN RIVERS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report in relation to the improvement of the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

MAJOR S. M. REYNOLDS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in relation to an appropriation for the relief of Major S. M. Reynolds, late assistant paymaster of the United States Army; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A. N. GREELEY, UNITED STATES ARMY.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report of the Adjutant-General on the case of Lieutenant A. N. Greeley, Fifth Cavalry; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CONGER. I ask that all those communications referring to rivers and harbors be printed.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

RE-IMBURSEMENT OF INDIAN EXPENSES.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, recommending an appropriation to re-imburse certain Indian expenses in Oregon; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

JAMES BROWN.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, relative to payment of James Brown, special agent of the Indian Department in Oregon; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

BLACK HILLS EXPLORATION.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting maps, plates, &c., of Professor Janney's report of exploration of the Black Hills; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

RENT OF WRIGHT'S BUILDING.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a deficiency estimate for rent of Wright's Building, in use by the Department; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

THE POLITICAL SITUATION.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House resolutions of the citizens of Ohio relative to the political situation; which was referred to the committee on the counting of the electoral votes.

WASHINGTON CITY MEDICAL LIBRARY.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a petition of the Medical Society of the District of Columbia, asking an appropriation for the benefit of the Medical Library, of the city of Washington; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

WASHINGTON AND GEORGETOWN RAILROAD.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the president of the Washington and Georgetown Railroad Company, transmitting the report of the transactions of the company for the year ending December 31, 1876; which was referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

RESIGNATION OF A MEMBER.

The SPEAKER. The Chair also communicates to the House a letter addressed to him, which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

NEW ORLEANS, January 8, 1877.

DEAR SIR: Having this day accepted the position of a justice of the supreme court of Louisiana, I hereby tender my resignation as Representative of the fifth district of Louisiana in the Forty-fourth Congress.

Respectfully and truly, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM B. SPENCER.

Hon. SAMUEL J. RANDALL,
Speaker of the House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

The letter was ordered to lie on the table.

BURLINGTON AND MISSOURI RIVER RAILROAD BILL.

Mr. McDILL. I presented the other day the petition of Horace Everett and thirteen other citizens of Council Bluffs, Iowa, remonstrating against the passage of the bill known as the Burlington and Missouri River Railroad prorate bill, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I ask that it may be printed.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, JUDICIAL, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations to report a bill making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1878, and for other purposes, and ask that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and made the special order therein for consideration on Friday next, after the morning hour, and from day to day until disposed of.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I reserve all points of order on the bill.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Will that order interfere with private bills?

Mr. HOLMAN. O, yes.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I object. Let the bill be made a special order for Saturday.

Mr. HOLMAN. I see no reason for changing the motion I have made.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the special order cannot be made except by a suspension of the rules. But the House can at any time when the bill has been referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union go into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the rule is very clear that the majority of the House can make an appropriation bill a special order. The gentleman from California [Mr. LUTTRELL] of course will perceive that if the House on Friday prefers disposing of the business on the Private Calendar it will not go into Committee of the Whole on this bill. The whole subject is under the control of the House.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I shall insist on a vote.

Mr. RUSK. Why not object? That stops it.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I do object. There are many bills pending on the Private Calendar, pension bills and others, which ought to be passed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will read the statement in the Digest relating to special orders:

Special orders are made under a suspension of the rules. [And of course, unless unanimous consent is given for the purpose, can only be made, except in the case of appropriation bills, when a motion to suspend the rules is in order.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I withdraw the bill.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I understand that if an appropriation bill is referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union the House can go into committee at any time?

The SPEAKER. At any time.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. And when the House gets into committee appropriation bills have the priority.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. Will not this be a question for the House to decide when a motion is made to go into Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. It is always within the province of the House to decide.

Mr. HOLMAN. I withdraw the bill.

RIGHT TO OPEN AND CLOSE DEBATE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires the indulgence of the House for a short time while he submits a few remarks touching a former decision of the Chair.

Some days ago a question of order arose as to the construction to be given to the rules of the House which control debate on a report of a committee. On the one hand it was claimed that under the rules a member reporting a measure from a committee had the right to occupy or control one hour to open debate, and then, if the previous question was sustained, he had the absolute right to an additional hour in closing. In another way of stating it, his last hour could not be shortened except by his own consent, without regard to the time he occupied in opening. The Chair then held that such construction of the rules was not correct, and decided that when a member reporting a measure had occupied an hour in opening, he could not then call the previous question, and if it was sustained, immediately thereafter claim and occupy an additional hour to close. The Chair has been delayed in making this statement, as requested, on the day before indicated because of the absence of members of the Committee on Rules with whom he was desirous to confer, and with whom he has conferred.

The Chair has given the subject the careful consideration that its importance demanded, and after thorough examination of the debates which occurred at the time of the adoption of the rules now numbered 60 and 63, as well as the precedents established since, he finds no occasion to change the decision heretofore made by him. The Chair will now give briefly his reasons for that decision.

No member shall speak more than once to the same question without leave of the House—April 7, 1789—unless he be the mover, proposer, or introducer of the matter pending; in which case he shall be permitted to speak in reply, but not until every member choosing to speak shall have spoken.—January 14, 1840.

It appears that this last clause of the present sixty-third rule, adopted January 14, 1840, was intended to restrict debate, as indeed it was so stated at the time.

Rules 29 and 30 as existing at the close of the Twenty-fifth Congress were as follows, namely:

RULE 29. No member shall speak more than twice to the same question without leave of the House; nor more than once until every member choosing to speak shall have spoken.

Rule 30. If a question pending be lost by adjournment of the House and revived on the succeeding day, no member who shall have spoken twice on the preceding day shall be permitted to speak without leave.

These rules were merged as amended into what is now the sixty-third rule of the House, in the Twenty-seventh Congress. From the debate it fully appears that it was intended to restrict or curtail debate and that this was rendered necessary by the dilatory debates of preceding Congresses, especially those in the Twenty-sixth Congress.

In the Twenty-seventh, Twenty-eighth, and Twenty-ninth Congresses it appears that this rule was construed and held to prevent any member from speaking more than one hour, except where an amendment had been offered, thereby changing the question, the member entitled to the floor on the pending measure was then entitled to an additional hour. (See House Journal, first session, Twenty-eighth Congress, page 532.)

It was found, however, that this rule was evaded by the practice of offering amendments, and the Committee on Rules, in the first session of the Thirtieth Congress, reported, on the 14th of December, 1847, the following as a substitute for the thirty-third, or hour rule, as it was called, namely:

It shall be in order to entertain a motion when made to limit the time which each member may occupy in debating any question in the House or committee to a period not less than one hour: Provided, That where the House has made an order fixing the time for discharging the committee from the further consideration of any bill, or other matter referred to it, (after acting without debate on all amendments pending or that may be offered,) debate by any one member before such order takes effect may be limited to one quarter of an hour, and thereafter the member who reported the measure under consideration from any committee may debate the same for one hour; and any member shall be allowed in committee five minutes to explain the object, nature, and effect of any amendment which he may offer; and all motions made to carry out this rule shall be decided without debate.

And also the following as an alternative proposition:

No member shall occupy more than one hour and a half in debate on any question in the House or in committee; but a member reporting the measure under consideration from a committee may open and close the debate: Provided, That where debate is closed by order of the House, any member shall be allowed in committee five minutes to explain any amendment he may offer.

From the debate which took place on the 18th of December, 1847, when the report was considered, it fully appears that the intent was to further limit or restrict debate, and this is confirmed by the amendment of Mr. Pollock to strike out the words "and a half," so as to limit the debate to one hour, which amendment was adopted without division. In the case cited on the 9th instant by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BURCHARD,] the decision by Speaker Cobb, in the first session, Thirty-first Congress, (see House Journal, first session, Thirty-second, Congress, page 1056,) it was decided that the gentleman who reported the then pending measure was entitled to an hour to close the debate after the main question had been ordered to be put.

In that case—the contested-election case of Miller vs. Thompson, from Iowa—the report was made by Mr. Strong, who opened the debate, which occupied two days, and then, an amendment having been submitted and several gentlemen having spoken in opposition to the resolutions reported by the committee, the Speaker decided that Mr. Strong was entitled to an hour to close the debate, though the main question had been ordered. In that case every member so desiring had spoken an hour or occupied so much of his hour as he wished. In the present case, the gentleman reporting the measure opened the debate, occupied or controlled the floor for one hour, and then it was claimed, the previous question having been sustained, that he had a right to another hour to close.

The Chair believes that any other construction than the one he has given would tend to destroy the equality of privileges which should exist, and which in fact does exist, between members of the House; and in addition the Chair is of opinion that the ruling will expedite and dispatch the public business, while the contrary course would retard and delay it.

The hour rule was adopted in these interests, and as practiced in the courts it gives to the plaintiff and defendant each the same extent of time, but to the plaintiff the privilege to divide his time so as to have the opportunity to open and close his case.

The Chair might give further reasons in support of his decision; but believing the foregoing to be sufficient, will only refer to a decision made by the Speaker of the last House, [Mr. BLAINE,] which is directly in point, which decision passed unquestioned by the gentlemen who have questioned the correctness of the decision under consideration.

On the 6th of June, 1874, in the first session of the Forty-third Congress, the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CANNON,] from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, reported back with amendments House bill No. 3414 to provide for the prepayment of postage on printed matter, and for other purposes.

Mr. CANNON took the floor, or in the language of the rule "opened the debate" on the said bill, and after replying to various interrogatories propounded, at the end of the hour demanded the previous question, when the following debate took place:

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I want to have it distinctly understood that if the previous question is now ordered there can be no debate and no amendment. Is that so?

The SPEAKER. That would be so.

The previous question was then seconded and the main question ordered; and the bill ordered engrossed, and read the third time.

The question then being on the passage of the bill, unanimous consent was asked for fifteen minutes' additional debate.

The SPEAKER. Is there any objection to allowing fifteen minutes for debate?

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. Has not the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] the right to an hour to close debate?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman took his hour before calling the previous question.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. Did he take the full hour? Has he not a portion of the hour left?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman, if he desires, can move to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was ordered.

The Chair believes that a liberal construction should be allowed in case of general debate having occurred, over a lengthened period, and in such case would rule an hour to close debate by the member reporting a measure as in case where a bill had been open to amendments; but to give to a member two consecutive hours in debate is, in the opinion of the Chair, at variance with the spirit of the rule, as well as against equity and propriety.

The Committee on Rules have been consulted by the Chair in relation hereto, and are of the opinion, with a single exception, [Mr. BANKS,] that the ruling made by the Chair is the correct one. They have, however, in view, further action, so as to submit to the House an amendment to the rules which will make the present rule plainer by the use of more explicit language in relation thereto.

Mr. BANKS. Is not this decision of the Chair open to the consideration of the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so, and the Chair would so desire.

Mr. BANKS. Then if the House now adjourns, the question will come up to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The Chair so desires. The Chair would state that he made his decision at the time, but was asked, as the gentleman from Massachusetts will remember, to arrest it so as to make further investigation and inquiry. The Chair, however, desires that the fullest time shall be allowed to any gentleman who desires to speak contrary to the decision of the Chair.

Mr. BANKS. The Speaker has made a decision which is now a matter of record, and the House have a right to consider that question and to make such revisal of it as it deems necessary.

COUNTING OF THE PRESIDENTIAL VOTE.

Mr. KNOTT. I rise to a privileged question. I call up the motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions reported by the select committee on the privileges, powers, and duties of the House of Representatives in counting the vote for President and Vice-President of the United States was recommitted to that committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the gentleman from Kentucky will give way, I will move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. BUCKNER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Will the consideration of this motion exclude the morning hour to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hold that it comes up as unfinished business.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. PHILLIPS, of Kansas, for ten days on account of important business.

And then, on motion of Mr. HOLMAN, (at four o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. CLYMER: The petition of C. B. McKnight and pastors of all the different churches of Reading, Pennsylvania, and of other citizens of said city, that aid be granted to the American Printing-House for the Blind, and the American University for the Blind, to the Committee on Education and Labor.

By Mr. COWAN: The petition of bankers and business men of Holmes County, Ohio, for the repeal of the national tax on deposits, circulation, and capital of banks, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. COX: The petition of F. Rives & Co., that an appropriation be made for the purchase by Congress of the stereotype plates and printed copies of the Congressional Globe in the possession of petitioners, to the Committee on Printing.

By Mr. FLYE: The petition of citizens of Waldoborough, Maine, for the repeal of all war taxes on banks, to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. HARDENBERGH: Papers relating to the claim of Henry M. Meade, for compensation for unavoidable losses sustained by him in the performance of his duties as paymaster in the United States Navy from 1862 to 1872, to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. MACDOUGALL: The petition of 65 citizens of Port Byron, New York, for the transfer of the telegraph lines to the Post-Office Department, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Also, the petition of 92 citizens of Clyde, New York, for arrears of pension to be granted disabled soldiers and sailors of which they are now deprived by law, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. NEAL: The petition of Joseph Blain and 39 other citizens of Pike County, Ohio, for cheap telegraphy, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania: The petition of citizens of Lancaster County, Pennsylvania, that pensions in all cases shall run from the date of the discharge of the soldier, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. TURNEY: Two petitions signed by 328 citizens of Greene County, Pennsylvania, for the amendment of section 4472 of the Revised Statutes so that crude petroleum can be transported on steamboats carrying passengers, to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. WALDRON: The petition of Lewis Christie and 85 other citizens of Oakville, Michigan, and vicinity, for the purchase of telegraph lines by the Government, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. WILLIAMS, of Alabama: The petition of citizens of Alabama, for the establishment of a post-route from Perote, in Bullock County, to Brundidge, in Pike County, Alabama, to the same committee.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, January 18, 1877.

Prayer by Rev. IRENEUS PRIME, D. D., of New York City.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

A bill (H. R. No. 4427) to remove the political disabilities of Frank S. Armistead, a citizen of West Virginia; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4439) to remove the political disabilities imposed upon John H. Forney, of Calhoun County, Alabama, by the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States.

HAYDEN'S SURVEY OF THE TERRITORIES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring therein,) That there be printed 4,500 copies of Professor Hayden's annual report of geological and geographical survey of the Territories for 1875 and 1876; 3,000 copies of which shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, 1,000 copies for the use of the Senate, and 500 copies for the use of the office of the survey.

GLENWOOD CEMETERY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. INGALLS, and Mr. COCKRELL the conferees on the part of the Senate upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 3741) amending an act incorporating the proprietors of Glenwood Cemetery.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. KERNAN presented the petition of James Mackay, a citizen of the State of New York, praying to be indemnified out of the Alabama claims fund awarded at Geneva for certain losses to him occasioned by the destruction of the ship B. F. Hoxie; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I present the petition of Francis E. Shepperd, of Virginia, praying for the removal of his political disabilities. A bill has been received from the House of Representatives for the relief of this gentleman and been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I move the reference of the petition to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WINDOM presented the petition of M. D. Nickles and 34 other citizens of Minnesota, praying the transfer of the telegraphic business to the superintendency of the Post-Office Department, and for cheaper telegraphic facilities; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Mr. WINDOM. I also present the petition of John N. Morrell and 47 others, citizens of Otsego and Elk River, Minnesota, praying the passage of the act allowing pensioners the amount of arrears to which they would be entitled by a removal from the statu es of the unjust limitation which has debarred many from receiving their just dues, and that they shall be entitled to receive in all cases pension from the date of discharge of the soldier. I ask its reference to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. INGALLS. Let it lie on the table, a bill having already been reported upon that subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will lie on the table, if there be no objection.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, presented the petition of L. B. Green and 100 other citizens of Jefferson County, Wisconsin, praying that pensions be paid from the date of the discharge of the soldier; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of E. Steele, Thomas Leckner, and other citizens of Monroe County, Wisconsin, praying for a general law to prohibit the liquor traffic within the national jurisdiction; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DAWES presented the petition of the Methodist Episcopal church of Highlandville, Massachusetts, signed by the pastor and officers, praying for prohibitory legislation for the District of Columbia and the Territories; the prohibition of the foreign importation of alcoholic liquors; that total abstinence be made a condition of the civil, military, and naval service, and for a constitutional amendment to prohibit the traffic in alcoholic beverages throughout the national domain; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CRAGIN presented the memorial of F. H. Poole and others, mates in the United States Navy, praying that mates in the Navy may be granted a warrant and placed on the same standing and bear the same relation to the service that the other warrant officers of the service do; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. MORRILL presented a petition of Rev. H. R. Nye, H. R. Cone, and other citizens of Brooklyn, New York, asking for the prohibition of the manufacture and sale of alcoholic liquors in the District of Columbia and the Territories; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WALLACE presented five memorials of owners of vessels, merchants, and members of the Board of Steam Navigation of Philadelphia, protesting against the passage of Senate bill No. 1056, for the regulation of steam and sailing vessels; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of Joseph Beale, jr., praying to be restored to the Naval Academy at Annapolis; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented two memorials of citizens and merchants of Philadelphia, praying for an amicable and speedy adjustment of questions growing out of the presidential election; which were referred to the joint select committee to devise a mode for counting the electoral vote for President and Vice-President.

He also presented a petition of S. J. Whitson, Isaac Broomall, and other citizens of Penningtonville, Pennsylvania, praying for the prohibition of the manufacture and sale of alcoholic liquors in the District of Columbia and the Territories; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SPENCER. I present the petition of Henry Brittner, D. M. Davis, R. Collins, and a large number of other citizens of the District of Columbia, praying for the passage of a law to secure the adjustment and payment of certain bills by them filed with the late board of audit or present government of the District of Columbia for damages to th ir property in the improvement of the streets of Washington and Georgetown. I move that this petition be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as it has reference to a bill that is before that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SPENCER presented a petition of Henry Phase, Stephen Duncan, and other citizens of Geddes, New York, asking for a general law to prohibit the liquor traffic within the national jurisdiction; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I present the petition of William Call, James Earnest Yeonge, Robert B. Hilton, and Robert Bullock, citizens of the State of Florida, who allege that they have been elected by the lawful vote of the State of Florida at the general election held on the 7th day of November last to be electors of the State of Florida to cast the vote of that State for President and Vice-President of the United States, and that the board of State canvassers, contrary to and without authority of law, and in defiance of the statute of the State, fraudulently canvassed the votes, and falsely and fraudulently declared that the petitioners had not received a majority of the lawful votes cast, &c., and praying that objection be made to the counting of any electoral vote of the State of Florida except that cast by the petitioners. I give notice that some day next week I shall submit some remarks on this subject to the Senate. I therefore move that for the present the petition lie upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the petition of Henry A. Mead, Robert Wasson, and other citizens of Cuba, New York, asking for the prohibition of the manufacture and sale of alcoholic liquors in the District of Columbia and the Territories; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SARGENT presented the petition of Hiram Mesick, Abraham Lewis, and other citizens of Albany County, New York, asking for a general law to prohibit the liquor traffic within the national jurisdiction; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SPENCER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2461) for the relief of certain officers of the Third United States Artillery who suffered by fire at Fort Hamilton, New York Harbor, on the 3d of March, 1875, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of T. Worthington, of Warren County, Ohio, praying compensation for water delivered to the troops at Camp Dennison, Ohio, during the late war, under contract, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed; and he moved that the claim be rejected: which motion was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Henry B. Woodhouse, a soldier of the war of 1812, praying his restoration to the pension-roll, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3575) granting a pension to Eliza A. Blaze, widow of Abner T. Blaze, late a private in Company C, Thirteenth Indiana Cavalry Volunteers, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 881) for the benefit of Brittania W. Kenyon, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3036) granting a pension to Mary McLain, widow of Charles McLain, late a lieutenant-colonel of the Two hundred and eleventh Pennsylvania Volunteers, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2519) granting a pension to James M. Bailey, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1106) granting a pension to Sylvester Wilcox, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3038) granting a pension to Almon F. Mills, late private Company K, Twenty-ninth Regiment Ohio Volunteers, reported it without amendment and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3581) granting a pension to Minerva Williams and her minor children, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3511) granting increased pension to Thomas G. Kingsley, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. ALLISON. I am directed by the Committee on Pensions to submit an adverse report on the petition of Mrs. Mary Walsh, praying to be allowed a pension on account of services rendered by her late husband, Redmond Walsh, late of Company H, Fourth Massachusetts Cavalry, during the late war. Mrs. Walsh wishes that a certain certificate presented with her petition may be withdrawn. I ask that that order be made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the withdrawal of a certain certificate connected with this petition? The Chair hears none.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the petition, and that the report be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I am directed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1063) to increase the pensions of Major Amasa J. Finch and First Lieutenant George W. Fitch, to submit an adverse report upon the application of George W. Fitch and a favorable report upon the claim of Amasa J. Finch. I therefore submit a substitute for the bill granting a pension to Amasa J. Finch, and ask to be discharged from the case of George W. Fitch.

The bill (S. No. 1036) to increase the pensions of Major Amasa J. Finch and First Lieutenant George W. Fitch was postponed indefinitely, and the report was ordered to be printed.

The bill (S. No. 1152) granting a pension to Amasa J. Finch was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WITHERS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1102) granting a pension to Michael Griffith, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3579) granting an increase of pension to Eugene O'Sullivan, late sergeant Company K, Eighteenth Missouri Volunteer Infantry, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BOUTWELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1154) granting a pension to Mrs. Fletcher Webster, widow of the late Colonel Fletcher Webster, of the United States Volunteer Army; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I desire to say that the bill proposes to furnish some relief to the widow of Colonel Webster, who was killed on the 30th of August, 1862, just in front of Washington. He was the second and last son of Daniel Webster, the first having lost his life in the war with Mexico. This lady is now sixty-five years of age and in actual distress. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Pensions, and I trust that the committee and the Senate will concur in granting this increase of pension. She now receives $30 a month and the bill proposes to give her $50.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HAMLIN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1155) to amend section 8 of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes," approved July 12, 1876, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1156) to establish certain post-routes in Wisconsin; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SARGENT (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1157) providing for experiments and the purchase of the best movable torpedo by the Navy Department; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORRILL (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1158) for the relief of Francis M. Strong and Thomas Ross; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in some and nonconcurred in other amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R.

No. 4307) making appropriations to supply certain deficiencies in the contingent fund of the House of Representatives, and for other purposes, and had agreed to the twelfth amendment with an amendment; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 4448) to remove the political disabilities of A. W. Burnet, of South Carolina; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 767) for the relief of Samuel B. Stauber and others; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4155) amending the act of July 28, 1876, entitled "An act for the relief of Kendrick & Avis, Kuner, Zisemann & Zott, all of Saint Louis, Missouri, and Nachtrieb & Co. of Galion, Ohio."

LOUIS PETOSKEY.

Mr. FERRY, (Mr. ALLISON in the chair.) I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 920, reported by the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 920) to authorize Louis Petoskey, of Michigan, to enter a certain tract of land which embraces his home and improvements, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes Louis Petoskey to enter the south half of the northeast quarter of section 5, in township 34 north, of range 5 west, in the district of lands subject to sale at Traverse City, Michigan, upon payment to the receiver of public moneys of the legal price thereof; the tract having been entered under date of April 25, 1854, by Louis Na-ba-no-ge-zhick, which entry was canceled July 26, 1856, because the land had not been proclaimed to be subject to private sale, and the purchase-money refunded to said Na-ba-no-ge-zhick; but prior to the cancellation, Louis Na-ba-no-ge-zhick sold the tract to Petoskey, who has ever since been in possession of the land as an actual settler, having made valuable improvements thereon in ignorance that his alleged title from Na-ba-no-ge-zhick was invalid.

Mr. FERRY. I think the bill explains itself. It has been reported from the Committee on Public Lands. The chairman is away and I have waited some time, but it is necessary that the bill should be passed soon in order to get through the House.

The facts are these: an Indian entered a piece of land and subsequently sold the land to this Petoskey, and the Government, owing to some informality—I think the informality was that it had not been proclaimed for private entry—canceled the entry, but notice was not given to the local office. The money was paid back to the Indian without the knowledge of Petoskey, to whom he had sold the land. Petoskey supposed he had a perfect title to it. He now proposes to pay the Government one dollar and a quarter per acre and receive a perfect title.

Mr. INGALLS. Are there any adverse claims?

Mr. FERRY. Not that I know of.

Mr. INGALLS. I am not informed as to the state of facts upon which this bill is based; but the Senator from Michigan must certainly be aware that all that portion of the bill after line 8 should be stricken out, because it is a declaration of a condition of facts which the Senate cannot know, and by which the Government ought not to be bound. Whether it is right or not, that Petoskey should have permission to enter the land is one question; but the Senator ought not to seek to bind the Government by any declarations like those contained in lines 8 to 19 of the bill, which are simply statements of fact that may or not be true. I move to strike out all the bill after the word "thereof" in line 8.

Mr. FERRY. I have no objection to that. The words are a statement of the facts which appeared before the committee, so that the bill could explain the facts of itself without any other information being necessary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ALLISON in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS.]

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WITHERS. Let the bill be reported as it stands amended.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That Louis Petoskey, of the State of Michigan, be, and he is hereby, authorized to enter the south half of the northeast quarter of section 5, in township 34 north, of range 5 west, in the district of lands subject to sale at Traverse City, Michigan, upon payment to the receiver of public moneys of the legal price thereof.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

W. S. M'COMB.

Mr. WRIGHT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 286.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 286) for the relief of W. S. McComb, of the State of Georgia, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on Military Affairs reported the bill with an amendment to strike out in lines 5 and 6 the words "rent of buildings accruing" and insert "furnishing stable-room for Government animals;" so as to make the bill read:

That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury are hereby authorized and directed to audit and settle the claim of W. S. McComb, of the State of Georgia, "for furnishing stable-room for Government animals," after the suppression of hostilities in the late war, and for which a voucher, now on file in the Treasury Department, was given; and to allow him the sum of $195, the amount named in the said voucher; and an amount sufficient to pay the same is hereby appropriated out of any money not otherwise appropriated by law.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT OF PENSION LAWS.

Mr. INGALLS. I move the present consideration of the bill (S. No. 36) amending the pension law so as to remove the disability of those who, having participated in the rebellion, have, since its termination, enlisted in the Army of the United States and become disabled.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read as it has been amended when formerly under consideration.

The CHIEF CLERK. The bill, as amended, reads as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the law prohibiting the payment of any money on account of pensions to any person, or to the widow, children, or heirs of any deceased person who in any manner engaged in or aided or abetted the late rebellion against the authority of the United States shall not be construed to apply to such persons as afterward voluntarily enlisted in the Army of the United States, and who while in such service incurred disability from a wound or injury received or disease contracted in the line of duty.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM JASPER CORDILL.

Mr. WINDOM. I move that the Senate take up for present consideration Senate bill No. 734.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 734) for the relief of William Jasper Cordill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The preamble recites that William Jasper Cordill, of Faribault County, State of Minnesota, did, on or about the 11th of March, 1856, file with the clerk of the court for Fillmore County, in that State, his affidavit and application in proper form for entry under the homestead laws of the United States, of the fractional northwest quarter of section No. 7, of township No. 101, of range No. 26, subject to entry at the district land office at Winnebago City, and did, on the 14th of June, 1866, remove with his family on said land, and did reside thereon for the full period of five years required by the homestead law, and still continues to reside thereon as shown by his proofs now on file in the General Land Office; that he did, in the year 1872, make full proof of his settlement, residence, and cultivation on the tract as a bona fide claimant under the homestead law, and applied for his final certificate therefor under homestead application No. 4038, made at Winnebago City, on the 31st of March, 1866, being, as he supposed, his original application filed with the clerk of Fillmore County, and was refused such certificate for the reason that the original application No. 4038, was not, in fact, made by William Jaspar Cordill, but was made by and in the name of his brother, one James W. Cordill; that James W. Cordill and other witnesses all agree that the actual settlement, residence, cultivation, and improvement upon the quarter section were made by William Jasper Cordill, and not by James W. Cordill; and that it is incompetent for the Commissioner of the General Land Office, as he deems, now to correct said mistake, and the parties have failed to show, after repeated effort, to the satisfaction of the Commissioner, how it occurred, there being no papers on file of the date of the original entry in the name or handwriting of William Jasper Cordill, but all the papers appearing under the genuine signature of James W. Cordill.

The bill authorizes the Commissioner of the General Land Office, in his discretion, to permit the final proof of William Jasper Cordill to be filed, and the final certificate to be made in his name, for the entry No. 4038, and to issue patent thereon for the northwest fractional quarter of section No. 7, of township No. 101, of range No. 26, in the district of lands now subject to sale at Worthington, Minnesota, formerly Winnebago City, and late Jackson district, in said State.

Mr. INGALLS. I should like to hear some explanation of this bill.

Mr. WINDOM. The bill was prepared by the Commissioner of the General Land Office and is precisely as sent to the committee by him for the purpose of correcting an omission or error in the original filing. The party has lived upon the land for eleven years, has made large improvements upon it. There are no other claimants, I think, but there is a defect that prevents his getting his title, an omission in the original formalities of the application. It is recommended by the Commissioner of the General Land Office and the bill was prepared by him. I think it can do no harm to any one, and it will give the settler a title to the land on which he has lived.

Mr. INGALLS. I hope the Senator will leave out the preamble and not ask us to vote on a state of facts we know nothing about.

Mr. WINDOM. I have no objection to striking out the preamble. It was prepared by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and I thought it would save a report and present a full statement of the case on the face of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question of the preamble will be in order after the passage of the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. INGALLS. Now I move to strike out the preamble.

The motion was agreed to.

ROBERT ERWIN.

Mr. GORDON. I move to proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 231, which had been the unfinished business up to yesterday. I understand from the Senator from Iowa, a member of the Committee on the Judiciary, [Mr. WRIGHT,] that he wishes to offer a substitute. I ask that the bill be called up for that purpose.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 231) for the relief of Robert Erwin.

Mr. WRIGHT. It will be remembered that this bill was called up a few days since and there accompanied the bill a report of the Committee on the Judiciary adverse to its passage and recommending its indefinite postponement. Since that time I have had a conference with the Treasury Department and am advised that a substitute which was handed me would be entirely satisfactory, and it is believed to be sufficient to protect the interests of the Government and at the same time give to this party his full day in court. I offer now this substitute to the bill. I understand there will be no objection to it on the part of the friends of the bill. In doing so, however, I wish to be allowed to say that I by no means concur in the principle of the bill; but that is a matter I have nothing to do with at present. I offer this substitute and trust it may be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and insert:

That the Court of Claims may take jurisdiction under the provisions of the act of March 12, 1863, entitled "An act to provide for the collection of abandoned property and for the prevention of frauds in insurrectionary districts within the United States," of the claims of Robert Erwin, of Savannah, Georgia, for property alleged to have been taken from him, which he claims were by accident or mistake of his agent or attorney, and without fault or neglect on his part as is claimed, not filed within the time limited by said act.

The motion was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

ANDREW WILLIAMS.

Mr. KELLY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 859) for the benefit of Andrew Williams, of Weakley County, Tennessee.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The preamble recites that there issued from the General Land Office of the United States on the 15th of December, 1859, a patent to B. R. McNabb for the west half of the northwest quarter of section 35, township 36, range 30, in the district of lands then subject to sale at Warsaw, Missouri, containing eighty acres; that on the same day there issued to McNabb a patent for the east half of the same quarter section; that both half quarter sections of land have been sold and conveyed by McNabb to Andrew Williams, now of Weakley County, Tennessee, that McNabb is now dead, and that there had, previous to the date of the issual of the patents, issued to other parties, Nathan Smally and Barnabas Cochran, patents for the identical same land above described, and the parties last named are now in possession thereof, claiming the same under their patents.

The bill directs the Commissioner of Pensions to issue to Andrew Williams two land warrants for eighty acres each, in lieu of land warrants numbered 32716 and 43008, the first of which was issued to Martha McNabb, widow of John W. McNabb, and the latter to Rebecca Skaggs, widow of Charles Skaggs, and which were located upon the land described.

Mr. BOGY. Authority is given to the Commissioner of Pensions to issue these land warrants. It should be the Commissioner of the General Land Office, should it not?

Mr. INGALLS. No; land warrants issue from the Commissioner of Pensions.

Mr. KELLY. The bill was regularly introduced in the House of Representatives directing the Commissioner of the General Land Office to issue these warrants. It was amended, however, in that body by inserting "the Commissioner of Pensions," who is required by law to issue bounty land warrants.

Mr. INGALLS. Let us hear the report.

Mr. KELLY. I will say that these lands were granted prior to the application of Mr. McNabb to two gentlemen named Smally and Cochran. They had initiated pre-emption claims prior to the location of these lands under the warrants from the Commissioner of Pensions, and of course the title failed that was acquired under this location. They have applied to have new warrants issued, so that they may locate lands elsewhere. I will send a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office to the desk that will explain the whole matter.

The Secretary read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., October 9, 1875.

SIR: In reply to your letter of the 17th May last, I have to state that an examination of the records of this office shows your statement with reference to the disposal of the northwest quarter of sections 35, 36, 30, Missouri, to be correct, and patents issued on the following locations and entry, namely:

East half of northwest quarter of said section, Nathan Smalley, pre-emptor per warrant No. 56409, act of 1855.

West half of northwest quarter of said section, Barnabas Cochran, pre-emptor per cash, warrant No. 56230.

East half of northwest quarter of said section, B. R. McNabb, location per warrant No. 32716, act of 1855.

West half of northwest quarter of said section, B. R. McNabb, location per warrant No. 43008, act of 1855.

It appears that the pre-emptions of Messrs. Smalley and Cochran were initiated prior to the locations of McNabb, and as the former were duly approved and patented it follows that their titles are good. Mr. McNabb is advised to surrender his patents to this office for cancellation and receive in return his land warrants for relocation.

Very respectfully,

S. S. BURDETT,
Commissioner.

JOHN T. BIRDSEYE, Esq.,
Nevada, Missouri.

Mr. KELLY. I will state that I have the patents here in my posession which were sent from the House of Representatives with the bill. The amendment proposed by the Committee on Public Lands of the Senate provides that the patents issued under these warrants shall be surrendered to the General Land Office before these new warrants shall be issued; so that the Government is saved. I ask for the reading of the amendment of the Committee on Public Lands.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment reported by the Committee on Public Lands, which was to add to the bill the following proviso:

Provided, That such land warrants shall not be issued to the said Andrew Williams until the patents issued to B. R. McNabb shall be returned to and canceled by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and that fact be certified by him to the Commissioner of Pensions.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. I suggest that the preamble to the bill be omitted.

Mr. KELLY. I have no objection to that, as it will have to go back to the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That question will arise after the passage of the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas moves to strike out the preamble of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

DEFICIENCIES IN APPROPRIATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 4307) making appropriations to supply certain deficiencies in the contingent fund of the House of Representatives, and for other purposes.

Mr. WINDOM. I move that the Senate non-concur in the action of the House and ask for a conference on the disagreeing votes.

The House have concurred in the appropriation of $25,000 asked for the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and have increased their own appropriation $33,000 for a similar purpose. I do not make the motion to non-concur because of any objection to that appropriation; but the House has also non-concurred in two amendments made by the Senate, to wit: one appropriating $40,000 for the transportation of currency required by the Treasury Department, and the second appropriating a small sum for some additional messengers to take care of the galleries, &c. It is on that ground that I ask a non-concurrence, so that there may be a committee of conference, and there will be no difficulty in disposing of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota moves that the Senate insist on its amendment disagreed to by the House and non-concur in the amendments of the House to the amendments of the Senate and ask for a committee of conference thereon.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. WINDOM, Mr. ALLISON, and Mr. WITHERS were appointed.

MANCHESTER SALT-WORKS.

Mr. STEVENSON. I move to take up the bill (S. No. 969) for the relief of those suffering from the destruction of the salt-works near Manchester, Kentucky, pursuant to the orders of Major-General Carlos Buell.

The bill was read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired.

COUNTING OF THE ELECTORAL VOTES.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I am directed by the select committee of the Senate——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will suspend a moment. It is the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business, the morning hour having expired.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I was not aware that there was any unfinished business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business is the resolution offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALLACE] to instruct the special committee on counting the electoral vote for President and Vice-President to inquire and report upon certain propositions in connection therewith.

Mr. BOGY. I understand the Senator wishes to make a report from a committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BOGY. I will yield with the understanding that when that is disposed of I shall be entitled to the floor.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am directed, Mr. President, by the select committee raised under the resolution of the Senate on the subject of the counting of the electoral votes, to submit a report in writing, with an accompanying bill. The report is signed, I am happy to say, with great unanimity by the members of both committees, it being a report in form, joint and several, to the two Houses. It is signed by all with one exception.

I give notice to the Senate that we shall desire to take up the bill at the earliest possible day, as time is running very fast; possibly, and I hope indeed, on Saturday, the day after to-morrow; but certainly on Monday, and to press it to a determination in some form steadily from that time forth. I only wish to say in addition that the committee are of opinion that the measure we recommend is not what is called a compromise in any sense of the term, but is a measure of justice in aid of the exercise of constitutional government; and that in no sense will anybody have a just right to say that anyone's opinions or views have been surrendered in any substantial respect. It is not a measure of policy or contrivance, but a measure of constitutional justice for the preservation in peace and order of the Government.

I ask that the report be printed.

Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. INGALLS, Mr. WRIGHT, and others. Let it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there no objection to reading the report? The Chair hears none, and it will be read.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suggest that the bill be read before the reading of the report proceeds.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read.

The bill (S. No. 1153) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President and decision of questions arising thereon for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877, was read the first time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Senate and House of Representatives shall meet in the Hall of the House of Representatives at the hour of one o'clock p. m. on the first Thursday in February, A. D., 1877; and the President of the Senate shall be their presiding officer. Two tellers shall be previously appointed on the part of the Senate and two on the part of the House of Representatives, to whom shall be handed, as they are opened by the President of the Senate, all the certificates and papers purporting to be certificates of the electoral votes, which certificates and papers shall be opened, presented, and acted upon in the alphabetical order of the States, beginning with the letter A; and said tellers, having then read the same in the presence and hearing of the two Houses, shall make a list of the votes as they shall appear from the said certificates; and the votes having been ascertained and counted as in this act provided, the result of the same shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall thereupon announce the state of the vote, and the names of the persons, if any, elected, which announcement shall be deemed a sufficient declaration of the persons elected President and Vice-President of the United States, and, together with a list of the votes, be entered on the Journals of the two Houses. Upon such reading of any such certificate or paper when there shall be only one return from a State, the President of the Senate shall call for objections, if any. Every objection shall be made in writing, and shall state clearly and concisely, and without argument, the ground thereof, and shall be signed by at least one Senator and one member of the House of Representatives before the same shall be received. When all objections so made to any vote or paper from a State shall have been received and read, the Senate shall thereupon withdraw, and such objections shall be submitted to the Senate for its decision; and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall, in like manner, submit such objections to the House of Representatives for its decision; and no electoral vote or votes from any State from which but one return has been received shall be rejected except by the affirmative vote of the two Houses. When the two Houses have voted, they shall immediately again meet, and the presiding officer shall then announce the decision of the question submitted.

SEC. 2. That if more than one return or paper purporting to be a return from a State shall have been received by the President of the Senate, purporting to be the certificates of electoral votes given at the last preceding election for President and Vice-President in such State, (unless they shall be duplicates of the same return,) all such returns and papers shall be opened by him in the presence of the two Houses when met as aforesaid and read by the tellers, and all such returns and papers shall thereupon be submitted to the judgment and decision, as to which is the true and lawful electoral vote of such State, of a commission constituted as follows, namely:

During the session of each House on the Tuesday next preceding the first Thursday in February, 1877, each House shall, by viva voce vote, appoint five of its members, who, with the five associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, to be ascertained as hereinafter provided, shall constitute a commission for the decision of all questions upon or in respect of such double returns named in this section.

On the Tuesday next preceding the first Thursday in February, A. D. 1877, or as soon thereafter as may be, the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States now assigned to the first, third, eighth, and ninth circuits shall select, in such manner as a majority of them shall deem fit, another of the associate justices of said court, which five persons shall be members of said commission; and the person longest in commission of said five justices shall be the president of said commission. The members of said commission shall respectively take and subscribe the following oath:

"I, ——— ———, do solemnly swear (or affirm, as the case may be) that I will impartially examine and consider all questions submitted to the commission of which I am a member, and a true judgment give thereon, agreeably to the Constitution and the laws; so help me God;" which oath shall be filed with the Secretary of the Senate.

When the commission shall have been thus organized, it shall not be in the power of either House to dissolve the same or to withdraw any of its members; but if any such Senator or member shall die or become physically unable to perform the duties required by this act, the fact of such death or physical inability shall be by said commission, before it shall proceed further, communicated to the Senate or House of Representatives, as the case may be, which body shall immediately and without debate proceed by viva voce vote to fill the place so vacated, and the person so appointed shall take and subscribe the oath hereinbefore prescribed, and become a member of said commission; and, in like manner, if any of said justices of the Supreme Court shall die or become physically incapable of performing the duties required by this act, the other of said justices, members of the said commission, shall immediately appoint another justice of said court a member of said commission; and, in such appointments, regard shall be had to the impartiality and freedom from bias sought by the original appointments to said commission, who shall thereupon immediately take and subscribe the oath hereinbefore prescribed, and become a member of said commission to fill the vacancy so occasioned.

All the certificates and papers purporting to be certificates of the electoral votes of each State shall be opened, in the alphabetical order of the States, as provided in section 1 of this act; and when there shall be more than one such certificate or paper, as the certificates and papers from such State shall so be opened, (excepting duplicates of the same return,) they shall be read by the tellers, and thereupon the President of the Senate shall call for objections, if any. Every objection shall be made in writing, and shall state clearly and concisely, and without argument, the ground thereof, and shall be signed by at least one Senator and one member of the House of Representatives before the same shall be received. When all such objections so made to any certificate, vote, or paper from a State shall have been received and read, all such certificates, votes, and papers so objected to, and all papers accompanying the same, together with such objections, shall be forthwith submitted to said commission, which shall proceed to consider the same, with the same powers, if any, now possessed for that purpose by the two Houses acting separately or together, and, by a majority of votes, decide whether any and what votes from such State are the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States, and how many and what persons were duly appointed electors in such State, and may therein take into view such petitions, depositions, and other papers, if any, as shall, by the Constitution and now existing law, be competent and pertinent in such consideration; which decision shall be made in writing, stating briefly the ground thereof, and signed by the members of said commission agreeing therein; whereupon the two Houses shall again meet, and such decision shall be read and entered in the Journal of each House, and the counting of the votes shall proceed in conformity therewith, unless, upon objection made thereto in writing by at least five Senators and five members of the House of Representatives, the two Houses shall separately concur in ordering otherwise; in which case such concurrent order shall govern. No votes or papers from any other State shall be acted upon until the objections previously made to the votes or papers from any State shall have been finally disposed of.

SEC. 3. That while the two Houses shall be in meeting, as provided in this act, no debate shall be allowed and no question shall be put by the presiding officer, except to either house on a motion to withdraw; and he shall have power to preserve order.

SEC. 4. That when the two Houses separate to decide upon an objection that may have been made to the counting of any electoral vote or votes from any State, or upon objection to a report of said commission, or other question arising under this act, each Senator and Representative may speak to such objection or question ten minutes, and not oftener than once; but after such debate shall have lasted two hours, it shall be the duty of each House to put the main question without further debate.

SEC. 5. That at such joint meeting of the two Houses seats shall be provided as follows: For the President of the Senate, the Speaker's chair; for the Speaker, immediately upon his left; the Senators in the body of the hall upon the right of the presiding officer; for the Representatives, in the body of the hall not provided for the Senators; for the tellers, Secretary of the Senate, and Clerk of the House of Representatives, at the Clerk's desk; for the other officers of the two Houses, in front of the Clerk's desk and upon each side of the Speaker's platform. Such joint meeting shall not be dissolved until the count of electoral votes shall be completed and the result declared; and no recess shall be taken unless a question shall have arisen in regard to counting any such votes, or otherwise under this act; in which case it shall be competent for either House, acting separately, in the manner hereinbefore provided, to direct a recess of such House not beyond the next day, Sunday excepted, at the hour of ten o'clock in the forenoon. And while any question is being considered by said commission, either House may proceed with its legislative or other business.

SEC. 6. That nothing in this act shall be held to impair or affect any right now existing under the Constitution and laws to question, by proceeding in the judicial courts of the United States, the right or title of the person who shall be declared elected or who shall claim to be President or Vice-President of the United States, if any such right exists.

SEC. 7. The said commission shall make its own rules, keep a record of its proceedings, and shall have power to employ such persons as may be necessary for the transaction of its business and the execution of its powers.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to have the bill read the second time by its title now.

The bill was read the second time by its title.

The Chief Clerk read the report, as follows:

The committees of the Senate and House of Representatives appointed under the following several resolutions—

HOUSE RESOLUTION.

"Whereas there are differences of opinion as to the proper mode of counting the electoral votes for President and Vice-President, and as to the manner of determining questions that may arise as to the legality and validity of returns made of such votes by the several States;

"And whereas it is of the utmost importance that all differences of opinion and all doubt and uncertainty upon these questions should be removed, to the end therefore that the votes may be counted and the result declared by a tribunal whose authority none can question and whose decision all will accept as final: Therefore,

"Resolved, That a committee of seven members of this House be appointed by the Speaker, to act in conjunction with any similar committee that may be appointed by the Senate, to prepare and report without delay such a measure, either legislative or constitutional, as may, in their judgment, be best calculated to accomplish the desired end, and that said committee have leave to report at any time."

SENATE RESOLUTION.

"Resolved, That the message of the House of Representatives on the subject of the presidential election be referred to a select committee of seven Senators, with power to prepare and report, without unnecessary delay, such a measure either of a legislative or other character, as may, in their judgment, be best calculated to accomplish the lawful counting of the electoral votes, and best disposition of all questions connected therewith, and the due declaration of the result; and that said committee have power to confer and act with the committee of the House of Representatives named in said message, and to report by bill or otherwise"— beg leave to report to their respective Houses that they have considered the subject named in said resolutions, and have had full and free conference with each other thereon, and now report the accompanying bill and recommend its passage. The substance of the bill embraces—

First. Provisions for the meeting of the two Houses, as required by the Constitution, and the general course of proceeding, and the declaration of the result.

Second. Provisions for the disposition of questions arising in respect of States from which only one set of certificates has been received; that each House shall consider the question and shall only decide against a vote by concurrent, affirmative action.

Third. Provisions for so-called double returns from a State; that such conflicting returns and papers shall be submitted to the consideration of a commission, composed of equal numbers of members of the Senate and of the House of Representatives and of the Supreme Court of the United States; that this commission shall be organized and sworn and have power to consider and decide, according to the Constitution and law, what is the constitutional vote of the State in question; and that such decision shall govern the disposition of the subject, unless both Houses shall determine otherwise.

Fourth. It is provided that the act shall not affect either way the question of the right of resort to the judicial courts of the United States by the persons concerned as claimants to the offices in question.

We have applied the utmost practicable study and deliberation to the subject, and believe that the bill now reported is the best attainable disposition of the difficult problems and disputed theories arising out of the late election. It must be obvious to every person conversant with the history of the country and with the formation and interpretation of the Constitution that a wide diversity of views and opinions touching the subject, not wholly coincident with the bias or wishes of the members of political parties, would naturally exist. We have in this state of things chosen, therefore, not to deal with abstract questions, save so far as they are necessarily involved in the legislation proposed. It is, of course, plain that the report of the bill implies that in our opinion legislation may be had on the subject in accordance with the Constitution, but we think that the law proposed is inconsistent with few of the principal theories upon the subject. The Constitution requires that the electoral votes shall be counted on a particular occasion. All will agree that the votes named in the Constitution are the constitutional votes of the States, and not other; and when they have been found and identified, there is nothing left to be disputed or decided; all the rest is the mere clerical work of summing up the numbers, which being done, the Constitution itself declares the consequence.

This bill, then, is only directed to ascertaining, for the purpose and in aid of the counting, what are the constitutional votes of the respective States; and, whatever jurisdiction exists for such purpose, the bill only regulates the method of exercising it. The Constitution, our great instrument and security for liberty and order, speaks in the amplest language for all such cases, in whatever aspect they may be presented. It declares that the Congress shall have power "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States or in any department or officer thereof." The committee therefore think that the law proposed cannot be justly assailed as unconstitutional by any one, and for this reason we think it unnecessary, whatever may be our individual views, to discuss any of the theories referred to. Our fidelity to the Constitution is observed when we find that the law we recommend is consistent with that instrument.

The matter then being a proper subject for legislation, the fitness of the means proposed becomes the next subject for consideration. Upon this we beg leave to submit a few brief observations.

In all just governments both public and private rights must be defined and determined by the law. This is essential to the very idea of such a government, and is the characteristic distinction between free and despotic systems. However important it may be, whether one citizen or another shall be the Chief Magistrate for a prescribed period, upon just theories of civil institutions, it is of far greater moment that the will of the people, lawfully expressed in the choice of that officer, shall be ascertained and carried into effect in a lawful way. It is true that in every operation of a government of laws, from the most trival to the most important, there will always be the possibility that the result reached will not be the true one. The executive officer may not wisely perform his duty, the courts may not truly declare the law, and the legislative body may not enact the best laws; but, in either case, to resist the act of the Executive, the courts, or the Legislature, acting constitutionally and lawfully within their sphere, would be to set up anarchy in the place of government. We think, then, that to provide a clear and lawful means of performing a great and necessary function of government, in a time of much public dispute, is of far greater importance than the particular advantage that any man or party may in the course of events possibly obtain. But we have still endeavored to provide such lawful agencies of decision in the present case as shall be the most fair and impartial possible under the circumstances. Each of the branches of the Legislature and the judiciary is represented in the tribunal in equal proportions. The composition of the judicial part of the commission looks to a selection from different parts of the Republic, while it is thought to be free from any preponderance of supposable bias; and the addition of the necessary constituent part of the whole commission, in order to obtain an uneven number, is left to an agency the farthest removed from prejudice of any existing attainable one. It would be difficult, if not impossible, we think, to establish a tribunal that could be less the subject of party criticism than such a one. The principle of its constitution is so absolutely fair that we are unable to perceive how the most extreme partisan can assail it, unless he prefers to embark his wishes upon the stormy sea of unregulated procedure, hot disputes, and dangerous results, that can neither be measured nor defined, rather than upon the fixed and regular course of law, that insures peace and the order of society, whatever party may be disappointed in its hopes.

The unfortunate circumstance that no provision had been made on the subject before the election has greatly added to the difficulties of the committees in dealing with it, inasmuch as many of the people of the country, members of the respective political parties, will perhaps look with jealousy upon any measure that seems to involve even the possibility of the defeat of their wishes; but it has also led the committees to feel that their members are bound by the highest duty, in such a case, to let no bias of party feeling stand in the way of a just, equal, and peaceful measure for extricating the question from the embarrassments that at present surround it.

In conclusion, we respectfully beg leave to impress upon Congress the necessity of a speedy determination upon this subject. It is impossible to estimate the material loss that the country daily sustains from the existing state of uncertainty. It directly and powerfully tends to unsettle and paralyze business, to weaken public and private credit, and to create apprehensions in the minds of the people that disturb the peaceful tenor of their ways and mar their happiness. It does far more; it tends to bring republican institutions into discredit, and to create doubts of the success of our form of government, and of the perpetuity of the Republic. All considerations of interest, of patriotism, and of justice unite in demanding of the law-making power a measure that will bring peace and prosperity to the country, and show that our republican institutions are equal to any emergency. And in this connection we cannot refrain from the expression of our satisfaction that your committees, composed of equal numbers of opposing parties, have fortunately been able to do what has been attempted in vain heretofore, almost unanimously agree upon a plan considered by them all to be just, wise, and efficient. We accordingly recommend the proposed act to the patriotic and just judgment of Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be printed under the rule. The bill will lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to have the bill printed not only in the regular way but printed in the report as a part of the document.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To be embodied with the report?

Mr. EDMUNDS. To be appended to the end of the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered, if there be no objection.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. U. S. GRANT, jr., his Secretary, announced that the President of the United States had, on the 16th instant, approved and signed the following enrolled bills:

An act (S. No. 752) authorizing the recorder of the District of Columbia to appoint an assistant with certain powers;

An act (S. No. 526) to amend section 1036 of the Revised Statutes relating to the District of Columbia;

An act (S. No. 739) to amend section 5457 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to counterfeiting; and

An act (S. No. 408) for the relief of Assistant Surgeon Thomas F. Azpell, United States Army.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House insisted on its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 604 and 605 to the bill (H. R. No. 3528) establishing post-roads, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. JOHN B. CLARK, jr., of Missouri, Mr. LUCIEN L. AINSWORTH of Iowa, and Mr. SAMUEL F. MILLER of New York, managers at the conference on the part of the House of Representatives.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 1016) for the relief of Virginia E. White, of Ohio County, West Virginia; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 1521) granting a pension to Louis A. McLaughlin;

A bill (H. R. No. 3500) granting a pension to Nelson Anslie;

A bill (H. R. No. 2242) granting a pension to George McColly;

A bill (H. R. No. 2842) granting a pension to Robert S. Toland;

A bill (H. R. No. 2287) for the relief of Peters & Reed, naval contractors at Norfolk navy-yard in the year 1860;

A bill (H. R. No. 940) for the relief of Edwin Ebert; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2353) making appropriation for the improvement and repair of the military road between Springfield and Fort Randall, in the Territory of Dakota.

COUNTING THE ELECTORAL VOTE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALLACE] to instruct the special committee on counting the electoral vote for President and Vice-President to inquire and report upon certain propositions in connection therewith is before the Senate, on which the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BOGY] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BOGY. Mr. President——

Mr. WITHERS. With the consent of the Senator from Missouri, I wish to make a statement. It will be remembered that yesterday I gave notice that I would endeavor to-day, after having had an opportunity to inform myself of the character of the speech made in response to my speech the day before by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] to reply to the same. Such was my purpose, but finding that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BOGY] has by previous notice a right to the floor to-day, I will reserve my reply to the remarks of the Senator from Indiana for some future occasion.

Mr. BOGY. Mr. President, a few days since I stated to the Senate that I should be prepared in a short time to prove from the testimony taken in the Louisiana case that the charges of fraud and intimidation on the part of the democrats were false. I am now prepared to redeem that pledge. The State of Louisiana and its internal affairs have been subjects of discussion in Congress for several years, and what was only of local interest at first has now become national. I say national because it may be that the vote cast in that State at the election held on the 7th of November last for President and Vice-President of the United States may determine who were elected to these two offices. But while the subject is national it is nevertheless true that the citizens of that State are infinitely more interested in its final settlement than any other. With them every thing is involved: their material prosperity, their political independence as one of the States of this Union, their right to self-government, and finally their good name. As I said on a former occasion, if they are the bad men represented by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] in the speech he made in this body a few days ago, they have retrograded in the scale of civilization, and are unworthy of the respect and esteem of the good citizens of the other States of the Union.

I have tried with great labor to study the question and to examine in the truth of these charges made against this people in this high place. This task is no easy one; the labor is indeed vast; the testimony in which you are to get to the truth or falsity of the charges fills two large volumes of one thousand pages each. Yet I think I shall be able to show from this evidence that these charges are not true and these efforts to destroy the character of the citizens of this State—to destroy its autonomy as one of the States of the Union and to place its entire government under military rule—is a vile conspiracy hatched several years ago, and which from the beginning has been with a fiendish persistency successfully maintained. It was and is a conspiracy to rob them of all their rights, both political and material; a double robbery, which has been up to this time a complete success; so much so that a region, formerly the abode of peace, wealth, prosperity, and the highest civilization, is now reduced to a constant condition of turmoil, discontent, poverty, and nearly absolute annihilation of society itself. Such is the condition of Louisiana to-day, and which has been brought about by this vile conspiracy! While this was only local and confined to that State alone, the people of the United States, singular as it may appear, took but little interest in their sad condition; while their appeal to their fellow-citizens of the other States was loud and continuous for years, yet there was no response to that manly voice and no echo to their long wail of suffering and sorrow; but this local plague-spot has now spread, and what was formerly local has now become general and affects all the other States. It becomes a question of interest for the entire country to know how Louisiana voted at the last presidential election, as it may be that this vote will decide the contest. This is truly fortunate for this State, and it is my sincere hope it may be the beginning of the end of their long agony.

This subject is perhaps the most important which has ever occupied the attention of the Senate. I regret my inability to do it justice. It would require the eloquence of a Cicero to place in proper light before the world the oppressions, the robberies, and the varied and crushing tyrannies which for years have been inflicted on the inhabitants of this State. The burning words of the great Roman orator when giving an account before the Roman senate of the robberies, oppressions, and cruelties of Verres in Sicily are familiar to everybody. Yet I venture to say that the outrages and cruelties and robberies and oppressions of every kind committed in this State by the conspirators who have held sway over it for years are infinitely greater—more numerous in kind and greater in degree. The Roman senate listened to the appeal of the great orator, and the vile propretor was recalled and Sicily thereby restored again to peace and prosperity. Shall it be said that at this day the American Senate will turn a deaf ear to the appeals made in behalf of the people of one of our sister-States? I hope not. I believe that, when the facts are placed before the country, as they will now be by the various reports of committees sent there recently, a feeling of indignation will manifest itself, strong enough to right the wrong and to do justice to this people, and that this body will lend a willing ear to me and others while placing before it the true condition of affairs in that State. To embrace this whole subject in one speech is an impossibility. I shall therefore be compelled to confine my remarks to but a few of the most salient points, leaving it to others to complete the work. And so that I may be as brief as possible I will confine myself to try and establish four propositions:

First. That according to the law of 1872, by which the returning board was created, this board as now organized is not legal.

Second. That it has no jurisdiction of the question of the election of electors.

Third. That it has no jurisdiction in any case of intimidation or other wrong-doing, said to have taken place at the time of registration or on the day of election, unless the third, twenty-sixth, and forty-third sections of the law are complied with.

Fourth. I will prove from the evidence taken and published that these sections were entirely disregarded, and under this same head I will also prove from the same evidence that there was no intimidation or violence at the registration or the election, but that on the contrary, the election was peaceable, quiet, and free, and if there was any intimidation or violence practiced it was by republicans on democrats.

The law creating this board, in the second section, provides:

SEC. 2. That five persons, to be elected by the Senate from all political parties, shall be the returning officers for all elections in the State, a majority of whom shall constitute a quorum, and have power to make the returns of all elections. In case of any vacancy by death, resignation, or otherwise, by either of the board, then the vacancy shall be filled by the residue of the board of returning officers.

It will be seen that this board is to consist of five persons, to be taken from all political parties. It is, however, at this time and has for a long time been constituted but of four persons, two of whom are white men and two are colored, and are all republicans. It would seem that the bare reading of the law and the statement of this fact are arguments enough to sustain my first proposition. If power is given to five persons to do a certain thing, it is certainly not given to four. But if in addition to this these five are to possess certain qualifications or characteristics, it certainly cannot be that four, not having these qualifications or characteristics, can exercise the powers conferred on the five who are required to possess these qualifications. There certainly was an important object to be accomplished which required that the members of this board should belong to different political parties. This object is perfectly plain, and of the greatest importance. That the intent of this law was to bestow the great power conferred by it on five men of different political parties is too plain to doubt, but to make this plainer, it will be seen that it was made the duty of the board to fill any and all vacancies which might occur, no matter from what cause. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] said the other day that the necessity of five members was not considered important, and for this reason no demand was made to fill this vacancy by the democratic party. This statement of the Senator is not sustained by the evidence, but on the contrary the proof is positive that the demand was made, and made with urgency, but the application was refused, the president, Mr. Wells, saying the remaining members could not agree on any one.

Mr. SHERMAN. I did not say that the democratic party did not demand the filling of the vacancy. The Senator must have misapprehended what I said. The democrats did demand several times that this vacancy should be filled and they named a gentleman.

Mr. BOGY. My recollection is that the statement was that this was considered to be of no importance, and it being so considered no demand was made to fill that vacancy by the democratic party.

Mr. SHERMAN. I certainly did not say that. I said the legal effect was not changed whether they had filled it or not. The legal power of the board was the same. In fact four years before, when the law was the same, the democrats had only three on the board, and there were no others. In point of fact the democrats not only complained of a failure to fill the vacancy but did demand that it should be filled. I certainly could not have said anything to the contrary of that.

Mr. BOGY. My recollection—of course I only state from recollection—is that he said it was considered to be of no importance and being of no importance no demand had been made by the democrats to fill the vacancy. If I am wrong in this, it will give me great pleasure to be corrected. In 1875 a committee was appointed by a republican House of Representatives to go to Louisiana to examine and report as to the election which had lately taken place in that State. On this committee were three eminent republicans, indeed among the most eminent of that party, and one of whom has since been the candidate of that party for Vice-President. These men were GEORGE F. HOAR, W. A. WHEELER, and W. P. FRYE. I here give an extract from their report made to the House:

The so-called canvass made by the returning board in the interest of Kellogg seems to us to have no validity, and is entitled to no respect whatever. * * * And your committee think the law as to the constitution of the board was not complied with. * * * We are constrained to declare that the action of the returning board on the whole was abitrary, unjust, and in our opinion illegal.

I therefore conclude that I have established my first point, namely, that this board as presently organized is absolutely illegal, and all its doings, judgments, and decisions are utterly null and void.

I will now read the third section of the law which gives jurisdiction to the board:

SEC. 3. Be it further enacted, &c., That in such canvass and compilation the returning officers shall observe the following order: They shall compile first the statements from all polls or voting-places at which there shall have been a fair, free, and peaceable registration and election. Whenever, from any poll or voting-place, there shall be received the statement—

I call the attention of Senators to those words—

Whenever, from any poll or voting-place, there shall be received the statement of any supervisor of registration, or commissioner of election, in form as required by section 26 of this act, on affidavit of three or more citizens, of any riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences, which prevented, or tended to prevent, a fair, free, and peaceable vote of all qualified electors entitled to vote at such poll or voting-place, such returning officers shall not canvass, count, or compile the statements of votes from such poll or voting-place until the statements from all other polls or voting-places shall have been canvassed and compiled. The returning officers shall then proceed to investigate the statements—

Mark this language—

The returning officers shall then proceed to investigate the statements of riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences at any such poll or voting-place; and if from the evidence of such statement they shall be convinced that such riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences did not materially interfere with the purity and freedom of the election at such poll or voting-place, or did not prevent a sufficient number of qualified voters thereat from registering or voting to materially change the result of the election, then, and not otherwise, said returning officers shall canvass and compile the vote of such poll or voting-place with those previously canvassed and compiled; but if said returning officers shall not be fully satisfied therof, it shall be their duty to examine further testimony in regard thereto, and to this end they shall have power to send for persons and papers.

That is, if a statement has been filed they may go on and get further testimony; but the statement must be filed before that can be done.

If, after such examination, the said returning officers shall be convinced that said riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences did materially interfere with the purity and freedom of the election at such poll or voting place, or did prevent a sufficient number of the qualified electors thereat from registering and voting to materially change the result of the election, then the said returning officers shall not canvass or compile the statement of the votes of such poll or voting-place, but shall exclude it from their returns: Provided, That any person interested in said election by reason of being a candidate for office shall be allowed a hearing before said returning officers upon making application within the time allowed for the forwarding of the returns of said election.

Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to this third section.

Mr. SHERMAN. If my friend will allow me, I will state that I have, with my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. STEVENSON,] looked over what I said; and I did not deny that the democratic party claimed that the vacancy ought to be filled. I said that if I had been on the board I would certainly have been willing to put on any democrat. I contended that the legal effect was not changed by the failure to fill the vacancy.

Mr. BOGY. I do not remember the words and I am willing to accept the correction made by the Senator.

Mr. SHERMAN. If you will look at the RECORD, you will see that I said so expressly; not only that, but I quoted Mr. Zacharie's demand that a democrat should be appointed.

Mr. BOGY. If I am wrong the Senator's correction will be in my speech, and he will have the benefit of it. I have no desire to place him in the wrong.

Mr. President, having read the third section, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to this fact, and there is no way of getting over it: The returning board in Louisiana has jurisdiction only if the foundation be laid for that jurisdiction by the return of th statements of riot or wrong-doing on the day of the election, or at the time of registration made by a supervisor of the election, or a commissioner of the election, who makes that report or statement through the supervisor. There is no way of getting over it. They have no right to take any testimony whatever unless the foundation be laid in accordance with the requirement of this third section. But, sir, to make that thing still stronger, if it is possible that it can be made stronger, I will read the twenty-sixth section.

SEC. 26. Be it further enacted, &c., That any parish, precinct, ward, city, or town in which, during the time of registration, or revision of registration, or on any day of election, there shall be any riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation and disturbance, bribery or corrupt influences at any place within said parish, or at or near any poll or voting-place, or place of registration or revision of registration, which riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation and disturbance, bribery or corrupt influences shall prevent, or tend to prevent, a fair, free, peaceable, and full vote of all the qualified electors of said parish, precinct, ward, city, or town, it shall be the duty of the commissioners of election, if such riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation and disturbance, bribery or corrupt influences occur on the day of election, or of the supervisor of registration of the parish, if they occur during the time of registration or revision of registration, to make in duplicate and under oath a clear and full statement of all the facts relating thereto, and of the effect produced by such riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation and disturbance, bribery or corrupt influences in preventing a fair, free, peaceable, and full registration or election, and of the number of qualified electors deterred by such riots, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation and disturbance, bribery or corrupt influences from registering or voting, which statement shall also be corroborated under oath by three respectable citizens, qualified electors of the parish. When such statement is made by a commissioner of election or supervisor of registration, he shall forward it in duplicate to the supervisor of registration of the parish; if in the city of New Orleans, to the secretary of state, one copy of which, if made to the supervisor of registration, shall be forwarded by him to the returning officers provided for in section 2 of this act when he makes the returns of election in his parish. His copy of said statement shall be so annexed to his returns of election, by paste, wax, or some adhesive substance, that the same can be kept together, and the other copy the supervisor of registration shall deliver to the clerk of the court of his parish for the use of the district attorney.

Mr. President, can language be plainer? First, in the third section you have the jurisdiction of the board. In the twenty-sixth section the duty of the officer of the election, whether supervisor or commissioner of election, is specified; that in the event of any of these wrong-doings occurring, either on the day of election or at the time of registration, it shall be his duty to make a return by way of a statement of all these facts; and not only that, but the mode of making the return is specified so that there shall be no room for fraud. This same return must be attached by some kind of adhesive substance to the return of the votes or the registration, so that it will be an impossibility in the city of New Orleans to open those returns when they get there and introduce false statements, as was done, as I shall show, in perhaps every case. Sir, human language cannot be plainer. It is impossible. It is made the duty of these officers, and the mode of executing that duty is also prescribed. But again, the forty-third section is also of the same character.

SEC. 43. Be it further enacted, &c., That immediately upon the close of the polls on the day of election, the commissioners of the election at each poll or voting-place shall proceed to count the votes, as provided in section 13 of this act, and after they shall have so counted the votes and made a list of the names of all the persons voted for, and the offices for which they were voted for, and the number of votes received by each, the number of ballots contained in the box, and the number rejected, and the reasons therefor, duplicates of such lists shall be made out, signed, and sworn to by the commissioners of election of each poll, and such duplicate lists shall be delivered, one to the supervisor of registration of the parish, and one to the clerk of the district court of the parish, and in the parish of Orleans to the secretary of state, by one or all of said commissioners in person, within twenty-four hours after the closing of the polls. It shall be the duty of the supervisors of registration, within twenty-four hours after the receipt of all the returns for the different polling places, to consolidate such returns, to be certified as correct by the clerk of the district court, and forward the consolidated returns, with the originals received by him, to the returning officers provided for in section 2 of this act, the said report and returns to be inclosed in an envelope of strong paper or cloth, securely sealed, and forwarded by mail. He shall forward a copy of any statement as to violence or disturbance, bribery, or corruption, or other offenses specified in section 26 of this act, if any there be, together with all memoranda and tally lists used in making the count and statement of the votes.

Mr. President, the third section, the twenty-sixth section, and the forty-third section all provide for one and the same thing; that is, if any intimidation or wrong-doing occur on the day of election, it must be returned to the board in New Orleans by one of the officers designated in these sections, and the time is specified when this return must be made. It must be made within twenty-four hours: first, the parish officers have twenty-four hours to make their returns to the parish clerk, and he within twenty-four hours thereafter must forward these returns as made to him in the mode prescribed by law, by mail, to the city of New Orleans.

It will be seen that according to these sections the board has no power to institute any complaint against any poll ex officio or of its own motion. It has no right to refuse to count a solitary vote returned to it by the parish officer, unless a legal foundation has been laid by the returns of the supervisor of the parish where the vote was cast, or by one of the commissioners of election reporting through such supervisor. The necessity of a compliance with these sections of this law has been propounded by me to the Senator from Ohio more than once, and he has failed or refused to give an answer. He makes an apology for this admitted non-compliance by saying that these supervisors or commissioners were afraid to do so for fear of assassination. Even if the apology was true in fact, a necessity for this compliance would not be relieved; a compliance would still be necessary; but, besides the fact that this apology is simply absurd, it is not founded in truth, for there can be no more danger in a supervisor making a return of intimidation occurring on the day of election than in saying the same thing in the shape of an affidavit made in the city of New Orleans. He is as much exposed to assassination in one case as in the other. I repeat, it is absurd—shamefully absurd; and the necessity of resorting to this kind of argument is proof that my construction of the law is correct. Indeed nowhere or by any one of any standing has it ever been denied that these sections had to be complied with. But so as to leave no doubt as to the construction of these sections, I will again quote from the report of Messrs. HOAR, WHEELER, and FRYE, made on the 23d February, 1875. They say:

That the returning board has no right to do anything except to canvass and compile the returns which were lawfully made to them by local officers, except in cases where they are accompanied by the certificate of the supervisor or commissioner provided in the third section. In such cases the last sentence of that section shows that it was expected that they would ordinarily exercise the grave and delicate duty of investigating charges of riot, tumult, bribery, or corruption on a hearing of the parties interested in the office. It never could have been meant that this board, of its own motion, sitting in New Orleans, at a distance from the place of voting, and without notice, could decide the rights of persons claiming to be elected. There is no more dangerous form of self-delusion than that which induces men in high places of public trust to violate law, to redress or prevent what they deem public wrongs.

This, sir, is an extract from the report of this committee. Who can doubt its perfect correctness? The law is plain—no ambiguity, no obscurity—not to understand it shows a singular perversity. There is no excuse even to be found in stupidity, for there stands the exposition in language that even the most ignorant can understand it.

It is therefore plain that this board has no jurisdiction to reject the returns from any voting-place on account of intimidation, riot, acts of violence, or any other act of wrong-doing unless the foundation is first laid by a return of that fact as required by this law. I say now, without the fear of successful contradiction, that in no case of the rejected parishes of Ouachita, East and West Feliciana, Baton Rouge, and Morehouse were such returns made as required by the law. This being so, the rejection of the votes of these parishes was utterly unauthorized, and is a simple act of infamous tyranny, against which all men who value the ballot should unite in reprobating. But I will not rest contented with merely denying the fact that no such returns were made. I will now undertake to show from the evidence taken by the democratic counsel who appeared before the board that the election in all these parishes was free, fair, and peaceable, excepting such acts of violence as were perpetrated by republicans against democrats.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before the Senator goes further, I will ask him whether I am correct in supposing that he alleges that no returns of intimidation from the bull-dozed parishes were filed, or does he simply say that no returns were filed within twenty-four hours?

Mr. BOGY. I say there were no returns in compliance with the terms of the law.

Mr. SHERMAN. Does the Senator base that on the fact that they were not made within twenty-four hours?

Mr. BOGY. I say there were no returns made from the parishes in accordance with that law. If any appear, whether made within twenty-four or forty-eight hours afterward, they were not from the parishes. If any returns are found, they were made in New Orleans many days after the election. I am prepared to show that.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is what I want to get at; whether the Senator bases his argument on the fact that they were not made within twenty-four hours, because I will confess they were not made within twenty-four hours. If he claims that they were not made, I will show him the actual returns.

Mr. BOGY. The Senator admits, and I am glad of the admission, that there were no returns made within twenty-four hours.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think the law requires that. I stated that point fully; I argued that fully. The Senator says I never contradicted that point. I did. I took up two columns of the RECORD on that point. I took up that very point. I do not know that my friend was present at the time.

Mr. BOGY. I was present and paid great attention to the Senator's speech. As I understood him to say, and as I understand him now from a careful reading of his speech, he ignored the necessity of a compliance with this law, not only with regard to the twenty-four hours of time, but the necessity of making the return from the parish even within a reasonable time or any time after the election. I admit returns appear to be made in the city of New Orleans when it was an impossibility to make a return without breaking the seals of the envelope, and which was itself a violation of law, as no one can have the right to break the seal but the returning board to whom it is directed.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is the very point. What was to prevent the officer carrying his copy of the returns to New Orleans and there attaching either outside or inside the return of intimidation?

Mr. BOGY. Because the law says he shall not do it.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is the question.

Mr. BOGY. There is no question about it. The law says he shall put his return under one envelope with the returns of the election; that he shall attach that return by wax or other adhesive matter. There is no room for doubt; the law prescribes that he shall make it within twenty-four hours, and not only that, but that he shall attach it to the returns of the votes, and states how he shall do it. This was not done in one single instance in any of these parishes, as I shall undertake to prove at the proper time.

I had intended to say something at length as regards the jurisdiction of this board over the election of electors, this being my third proposition, but as my remarks will necessarily be much longer than I desire, I shall be compelled to abandon it for the present by merely saying that on this question I have no doubt the election law of 1872 does not in words and was not intended to cover the electors. The law of 1868, revived in 1870, covers the case of electors, and under this law the electors were voted for at the last election, and not under the law of 1872.

I will now proceed to establish my fourth and last proposition. I bespeak the patience of my hearers, as the largest part of what I shall say will be the evidence taken by the democratic counsel under the ruling of the board. I will at the outset call attention to this most important fact which distinguishes this evidence from that taken by the republican side. Our, or the evidence taken by the democratic side, was taken in the different parishes where the elections were held, and is generally the testimony of the leading men of the parish, men of standing and character and formerly of wealth, or the testimony of the officers of the Army of the United States stationed in those parishes, or the testimony of the supervisors or commissioners of elections, who are generally, if not all, republicans; or the testimony of the clerks of the different parishes in which elections were held. Thus making a mass of testimony which is perfectly overwhelming. While, on the other side, the testimony was taken in New Orleans, miles away from where the election took place, and is composed of affidavits taken in the custom-house of men generally unknown, the vagabonds, loafers, and wharf-rats always found in large cities, men willing to swear to anything for money; that class of men who are restrained from doing wrong only by the strong arm of the law. And these affidavits prepared by a class of men equally as abandoned, and because more intelligent only more guilty. It is upon this testimony that this case is to be tried by the high tribunal of the people of the United States.

Sixty-nine polls were rejected in twenty-two parishes, as will be seen by the following statement:

Official compiled returns of an election held in the ——, State of Louisiana, on the 7th day of November, A. D. 1876, under a writ of election, dated September 16, A. D. 1876, ordering same, and pursuant to the provisions of act No. 98, to regulate the conduct and to maintain the freedom and purity of elections; to prescribe the mode of making returns thereof; to provide for the election of returning officers, and defining their powers and duties; to prescribe the mode of entering on the rolls of the senate and house of representatives; and to enforce article 103 of the constitution, approved November 20, A. D. 1872, to wit:

CERTIFICATE.

I hereby certify that the above is a correct statement of the number of polls and total number of votes rejected by the board in the several parishes.

CHAS. S. ABELL,
Secretary Board of Returning Officers, State of Louisiana.

NEW ORLEANS, December 19, 1876.

A true copy:

ROBT B. LYONS,
Secretary Senate Committee.

NEW ORLEANS, December 20, 1876.

I have carefully examined each one, and when I read portions of the testimony taken as to each parish it will be easily understood that I can only read a part; I regret to say but a small part of this voluminous testimony, the whole of which is in a book on our table that contains upward of one thousand pages. I will read a part of the testimony for the parish of West Feliciana, being one of the parishes rejected. The testimony as to this parish will be found to begin at page 982. I read, first, the certificate of Charles J. Howell, clerk of the district court of that parish. I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that he is the clerk of the court of the parish, with whom the law requires the statement to be filed. He certifies that no statement of intimidation or wrong-doing of any kind was filed by Supervisor Weber in this parish.

THE STATE OF LOUISIANA,
Parish of West Feliciana:

I, Charles J. Howell, clerk of the district court of the seventh judicial district of the State of Louisiana, in and for the parish of West Feliciana aforesaid, do hereby certify that to the statements of votes polled November 7, A. D. 1876, filed in my office from the polls held at Saint Francisville for ward No. 7 and wards Nos. 8 and 12, those held in wards Nos. 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6, in their respective wards, two polls held in ward No. 7, to wit, at Tunica and the Belleview plantation, (Acklen's,) and in wards Nos. 9 and 10, or any other ward or voting-place in the parish, no affidavits, statements, or protests of any kind whatever were made or attached by the commissioners of election, or either of them, or by Desire A. Weber, supervisor of registration, or by three citizens, or any citizen or person of the said wards or parish; and further certify that no affidavits, protests, or statements of any kind were attached or filed, or offered to be filed or attached, in connection with said statement of votes of commissioners, by the said commissioners of election, Desire A. Weber, supervisor of registration of this parish, or any other officer or person or persons, under section 2 of act No. 98, acts of 1872; that no affidavits, protests, or statements, in writing or otherwise, in regard to the election of the 7th day of November, A. D. 1876, and the one hundred and first of the Independence of the United States of America, or the registration previous thereto, was even presented for filing or filed by any officer, or person or persons, candidate or candidates for office, or any officer of election, up to the date of the signing thereof.

Given under my official signature and seal of office this the 20th day of November, A. D. 1876, at the town of Saint Francisville, in the parish of West Feliciana, State of Louisiana.

CHARLES J. HOWELL,
Clerk of the District Court of the Seventh Judicial District of the State of Louisiana in and for the Parish of West Feliciana.

It is well to draw the attention of the Senate to the fact that this is the certificate of the clerk of that parish, an official document, in which he states that no statement, no affidavit, nothing of the kind was filed with him in relation to any wrong-doings in that parish—nothing whatsoever at any time. Now, I will read the testimony of several colored men:

STATE OF LOUISIANA,
Parish of West Feliciana:

Personally appeared before me, the undersigned authority, the persons whose signatures are hereby affixed, (colored,) who, being duly sworn, depose and say that they voted the democratic ticket at the third-ward precinct, at the general election, November 7, 1876; that they voted the said ticket voluntarily, without fear or intimidation of any kind, or any inducement in the way of reward; that they know of no intimidation practiced upon any voters in order to induce them to vote the democratic ticket.

THE STATE OF LOUISIANA,
Parish of West Feliciana:

Personally appeared before me, the undersigned authority, the persons whose genuine signatures are affixed hereto, and each, after being sworn, deposed and said: I am a citizen of this parish, and have resided here many years. I was present and voted on the 7th November, at ward No. 4 precinct. There was no disturbance or intimidation of any kind. There was the usual amount of electioneering, but it was entirely legitimate, and every person, white and colored, exercised his right of suffrage without force, let, or hinderance. The colored people, especially, crowded the polls of their own accord and voted as they pleased. I saw no one with arms at the polls, or in going to or returning therefrom; nor have I heard that any armed man, or men of any kind, prevented colored voters from going to the polls on that day. Peace and good order prevailed and the election passed off quietly. The State peace officers and United States supervisors of both parties and a United States marshal were present, and not an arrest was made, and no complaint was made to them by any person.

W. S. HAMILTON,
Justice of the Peace, Fourth Ward.

The same character of testimony with that which has been read from page 982 to 1007. Of course all that cannot be read here at this time, but all prove the same thing, that the election was quiet, peaceable, and orderly throughout this parish.

I will now read from testimony taken in the parish of Franklin, found on page 644:

Interrogatories to be propounded to H. T. Earle, H. Block, and I. G. Hawkes, the answers to which are to be used before the board of returning officers, in the matter of the contest of Franklin Parish:

Interrogatory 1. What is your name, occupation, and residence?

Interrogatory 2. Where were you during the registration and revision of registration during the present year, 1876?

Interrogatory 3. If you state you were in Franklin Parish during the time alluded to in the second interrogatory, how was the registration conducted? State whether every man had full and free opportunity to register and whether the registration in said parish was full or not. If not, why?

Interrogatory 4. Where were you on the day of election, to wit, November 7, 1876?

Interrogatory 5. If you state that you were in the parish of Franklin, state also whether said election was conducted peacefully and fairly or not. State fully as to how all parties acted on said day, and whether or not any political disturbance occurred in Franklin Parish on said day, and state your means of knowing.

Interrogatory 6. Was not the election in Franklin full, free, fair, and peaceable?

Interrogatory 7. Does it not come within your knowledge that the conservative party did everything in their power to preserve quiet, peace, and order during the registration and election?

Interrogatory 8. State anything further you may know touching the matter herein inquired of, and give full particulars.

Answers of H. T. Earle to interrogatories-in-chief.

To interrogatory 1. My name is H. T. Earle. I am clerk of the court, and reside in Franklin Parish, Louisiana.

To interrogatory 2. I was in the parish of Franklin, and, from the 20th September, 1876, up to November 9, I was present with the supervisor of registration, except occasional absences.

To interrogatory 3. The registration was conducted fairly when I was present, except in one instance the supervisor refused to register a colored man on the ground that he did not think he was of age, the party being willing to make the proper affidavit. The registration-books were open from the 28th August to the 28th October, and every man had an opportunity to register that desired to do so, if no legal objections prevented him, with the exception of the case above referred to. The registration was the largest ever made in the parish.

To interrogatory 4. I was in the town of Winnsborough, ward No. 7, and poll 7.

To interrogatory 5. I have stated where I was in my answer to the fourth interrogatory. The election was conducted peacefully and fairly, and all parties, on said day, conducted themselves peaceably, and there was no political disturbance at the polls nor any in the parish that I am aware of. My means of knowing that there was no political disturbances on the day of election are from the commissioners of election and citizens of the parish in each voting-precinct, who stated the facts to me, and from affidavits made by citizens of various wards to that effect.

To interrogatory 6. The election in Franklin Parish was full, free, fair, and peaceable, so far as I know.

To interrogatory 7. It is within my knowledge that the democratic party, during the registration and election, counseled peace and quiet, and all the leading citizens so declared themselves.

To interrogatary 8. I was United States supervisor of registration for Franklin Parish; was present at the registration from the 20th September to 28th October, except occasional absences. I have stated how the registration was conducted, and every man registered that wished to do so, except as before stated. I was informed by some of the planters that there was some of their people, colored, that would not register, although requested to do so by them, as they cared nothing about voting.

H. T. EARLE.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this 1st day of December, 1876.
WM. H. HOLMES,
Second Justice of the Peace, Parish of Orleans.

The man whose testimony has just been read was United States supervisor of the parish, and you have heard his testimony. I have read the testimony of the clerk that no certificate had been filed as required by the law; the testimony of the supervisor that the election throughout the parish was peaceable, quiet, and without any violence; and yet this was one of the parishes rejected by the returning board. The same character of evidence will be found from page 640 to 647, which I will not detain the Senate by reading.

The same thing as to the parish of De Soto, beginning on page 298:

Before me, the undersigned authority, came and appeared E. W. Sutherlin, witness to whom annexed interrogatories are propounded, who, after having been duly sworn, deposes thereto as follows, namely:

To interrogatory 1. My name is E. W. Sutherlin; I reside at Mansfield, in the parish of De Soto; have resided in said parish since the year 1852, the time of my birth, and was at home, in said parish, on the day of the late election, on November 7, 1876, and was not absent from said parish at any time for two months prior to said election. I am a practicing attorney at law.

To interrogatory 2. I am familiar with the conduct of the registration and election in said parish during the late political campaign, having been born and raised in said parish and resided there all my life, and having practiced my profession therein for the last three years, and in a professional way having had an interest in a large portion of the criminal and civil list in the courts of said parish during that time, and having canvassed the parish as a public speaker in the interest of the democratic and conservative party in the campaign of 1874 and also in the campaign of 1876, visiting every ward and neighborhood during the campaign, and having taken a great deal of interest in public affairs, and being acquainted with nearly everybody in said parish furnished my means of information. I am able to say, from my own personal knowledge, that during said campaign, and at said election and subsequent thereto, there did not exist any intimidation, fraud, or violence on the part of members of the democratic-conservative party toward members of the republican party in said parish. Said registration and election were free, fair, and peaceable in said parish. The number of voters registered in said parish was larger, to the best of deponent s information, than the number of persons registered at any previous election, and the number of votes polled at said election was larger, to best of deponent s information, than was ever polled at any previous election in said parish. The number of republican votes polled in said parish at the said election was about 895, and much larger than ever before polled for that party in said election at any previous election. Deponent made many public speeches in said parish during said campaign, and always advocated peace and conciliation. Deponent heard many public speeches made during said campaign by members of both political parties in said parish, but never heard a speech of any other character made during said time; said registration and election was fair and peaceable. The whole campaign was of eminent harmony and conciliation. Deponent has heard of attempts on the part of colored republicans to influence co ored democrats by means of social and religious ostracism, but can't say of his own knowledge to what extent it prevailed and with what effect. Deponent does not know nor has he heard of a single instance of abuse, intimidation, or threats on the part of the democrats towards republicans on account of political opinions; nor does he know nor has he heard of a single instance of violence during said campaign of one party toward the other on account of politics. Deponent never in his life saw the people of said parish, both white and black, more peaceable and quiet and law-abiding than they were during said campaign, at said election, and subsequent thereto; that during said campaign there were several public joint discussions of political questions in said parish, in which members of both political parties took part. Deponent himself, in several instances, participated as public speaker at such joint discussions, and nothing, so far as deponent knows, ever occurred at such meetings to mar the harmony or disturb the quietude of each occasion; leading members of both parties were perfectly satisfied with the manner in which the election and registration had been conducted, and so expressed themselves to deponent.

Among the leading republicans of said parish who made this admission to deponent were J. J. Johnson, J. M. Coste, W. F. Talbert, Jerry Hardy, D. S. Tyler, and many others. Deponent never heard any one of any political party charge that there had been any fraud, violence, or intimidation used or resorted to in said parish to influence, except as above stated, nor did he ever hear that any such charge had been made until he arrived in this city, about ten or twelve days ago. Deponent never witnessed the manifestation of any disposition on the part of the democrats to in any manner interfere with the political or legal rights of the republicans, or to hereafter, or obstruct them in the free and unrestrained exercise thereof. Deponent never heard of the existence of any such disposition on the part of the democrats until he arrived in this city, as aforesaid. If such had existed, deponent would certainly have heard of it. Deposition to special interrogatory, namely, Deponent says I am acquainted with C. L. Ferguson, who was the supervisor of registration for said parish for said election. Deponent was at Mansfield, poll No. 4, on the 7th of November, the day of said election, and that C. L. Ferguson was also present at said polling place on the day of said election. Deponent did hear C. L. Ferguson admit that so far as he knew said registration and election was free, fair, and peaceable; said admission was made by said Ferguson in the office of the clerk of district court of said parish, at the court-house in said town, on the 7th of November, 1876, in the presence of William C. Reynolds, W. P. Hall, deponent, and many others, immediately after the closing of the polls at said polling place, when and where C. L. Ferguson and many leading republicans and democrats signed a written statement to that effect, which statement is hereto annexed and marked "A," for reference to support the verity of the deposition. Deponent also annexed a sworn statement made by said Ferguson on the 10th of November, 1876, before W. C. Reynolds, clerk, and marked "B." Deponent also heard C. L. Ferguson say to him on or about the 15th November, 1876, in presence of Larkin Matthews, a colored man, when they three were traveling together in the stage from Mansfield to Shreveport, that said registration and election in said parish was peaceable and fair, and such as he liked to see.

Mr. Ferguson was the supervisor of that parish. At page 310 there is very long testimony which I will not read, but it is of the same character, and extends from that page to page 327. I will turn now to East Feliciana, page 439.

To J. W. PATTON,
Chairman Democratic State Central Committee:

The subscribed, for themselves and other citizens of the parish of East Feliciana, make the following statement, and ask the assistance of your committee for any relief that can be obtained.

Since Saturday the 7th instant, (October,) the office of the supervisor of registration for this parish has been closed, and a large number of our citizens have been and will be deprived of any opportunity to register and vote at the approaching election.

Since the 14th instant James E. Anderson, the supervisor of registration for the parish, has been absent, having on the 13th turned over to the clerk of the court the books of his office, announcing that he had resigned, and on the following day taken his departure for the city of New Orleans.

He alleged that he was driven from the parish and that he left the same because while there he was in fear of his life; that this fear was induced by an attempt at assassination by some unknown persons lying in ambush on the road from Jackson to Clinton, on the night of the 7th instant.

On that night he left Jackson in a buggy with one John Pilant (a republican) and arrived in Clinton on foot alone, exhibiting a coat riddled with bullets, and making complaint as aforesaid.

A careful judicial investigation developed circumstances that proved the whole story about the ambuscade false; the shots upon the road and the bullet-riddled coat parts of a poorly contrived scheme to give color to a plot which must have been previously concocted, in order to throw upon our people the odium and burden of having attempted the assassination of a republican supervisor of registration and of preventing him from performing the duties of his office. The more recent confession of Pilant established the fact that Mr. Anderson himself fired the shot by which his coat was injured, and that other shots were fired by a friendly accomplice.

During the whole of the stay of Mr. Anderson in this parish (he had never entered it before his appointment) he was never threatened, assaulted, or intimidated, although he became at times, while under the influence of strong liquors, turbulent, quarrelsome, and insulting. It was the anxious desire of the whole of the people of this parish that the registration of voters should be completed and the election held fully, fairly, and peaceably, and every citizen has given his utmost endeavors to that end.

After the retirement of Mr. Anderson two of the citizens of this parish waited upon the executive of the State and requested he should appoint his successor at once, in order that the registration of the voters of the parish might continue.

After two interviews they were informed that Mr. Anderson would be immediately sent back for that purpose. This was on the 16th instant. We are now at the 20th, with only two more days within which this registration may be completed, and yet Mr. Anderson has not been sent back, nor is there any one here to perform his duties. It would seem the purpose of the administration to prevent the full registration of the voters of this parish, and the course pursued by it, with the attending circumstances, seem to indicate a determination to deprive the people of the right and privilege of holding an election on the 7th of next month.

The absence of the supervisor of registration under the pretext we have set forth has already accomplished the first wrong against our people, and the failure to remove and appoint another supervisor or to designate some parish officer to discharge the duties of this absent supervisor, under section 36 of the registration act No. 155, of 1874, must have been with a design of accomplishing its necessary consequences. We can but presume that the absence of this supervisor will continue, and that the executive will continue to fail and refuse to make the necessary appointment, and that consequently there will be no appointment of commissioners of election, and that it will be said that no legal election has been held in this parish.

We beg that you will take such steps as may be necessary to insure us the exercise of the highest and most sacred right of the citizen.

Very respectfully, your obedient servants,

THE STATE OF LOUISIANA,
Parish of Orleans:

Personally came and appeared before me, the undersigned authority, Jessie Harrison, a citizen of East Feliciana and State aforesaid, who deposes and says that on the 21st day of November, 1876, in the city of New Orleans, said State, Henry Smith and E. L. Weber, the latter a senator of Louisiana, came to him, deponent, to prevail upon deponent to go before a republican committee and testify that intimidation of the colored voters was practiced by the democratic party in East Feliciana, before and on the day of election held there on the 7th November, 1876; that the republican party was on its last legs and needed such testimony as that of deponent; that the evidence of deponent was worth more to the republican party than that of one hundred white men. Further deposes and says that at the earnest solicitations of said Weber and Smith that the deponent went to the custom-house on the 21st day of November, 1876, and was introduced to S. B. Packard, and that T. H. Hubborn remarked to him, deponent, that it was not becoming for Packard to offer him, deponent, anything in the shape of a bribe to procure evidence to prove intimidation had been resorted to in East Feliciana by the democratic party to influence the colored vote, but that any arrangement made by him, Hubborn, would be binding on Packard. Further deposes and says that the said Hubborn did, then and there, tell him, deponent, that if he, deponent, would testify before the republican committee that intimidation had been resorted to by the democratic party to influence the colored vote, that he, the said Hubborn, would secure me, deponent, a position worth from $75 to $ 00 per month, or, that if he, deponent, would refrain from giving any testimony detrimental to the republican party before a committee of democrats, that the same position would be secured him; that said conversation occurred in the custom-house, in an office on the left of the main entrance on Canal street, on the second floor; that said conversation was in full hearing of S. B. Packard, republican candidate for governor, in so far as the offer to give deponent the position if he would testify as requested, but toward the latter part of the conversation said Packard turned away and walked off.

Further deposes and says that he, deponent, joined the democratic party of his own free will and accord, and that he, deponent, canvassed the parish as a public speaker in the interest of the democratic party, and that in no instance did he, deponent, witness any intimidation of the colored voters by the democrats, but to the contrary, saw efforts made by the republicans to prevent the colored voters from voting the democratic ticket.

Further deposes and says that he, deponent, and his democratic white friends, assured them, the colored voters, that they could vote as they pleased.

Further deposes and says that a more peaceable election never took place in the parish of East Feliciana as the one held on the 7th November, 1876.

WM. H. HOLMES,
Second Justice Peace, Parish of Orleans, Louisiana.

I will state, so as to make this complete, that Weber, spoken of in this affidavit, offered to bribe this man. After failing to do this he then filed a protest against the receiving of the vote of that parish, which protest was made and filed in New Orleans, and the vote was accordingly rejected. This so-called protest is not even dated, and does not state it was made in New Orleans; but this is the fact.

To Hon. J. Madison Wells, President, and the Returning Officers for the State of Louisiana:

GENTLEMEN: As a candidate for State senator from the twelfth senatorial district of Louisiana, composed of the parishes of East Feliciana, West Feliciana, and Point Coupee, and thereby interested in the result of the general election held November 7, 1876, I hereby protest against the count of votes cast in the several polls in the said parish of East Feliciana, on the grounds and for the reasons stated in the statements of the supervisor of registration of said parish, together with accompanying documents.

Very respectfully,

E. L. WEBER,
Candidate for State Senator, Twelfth Senatorial District, Louisiana.

On this protest, filed by this man Weber, the vote of this parish was rejected. He states that he bases his protest on the statement of the supervisor. I will now prove by the clerk of the parish that no statement was filed in the parish in accordance with the law by the supervisor:

THE STATE OF LOUISIANA,
Parish of East Feliciana, Clerk's Office:

I, John S. Lanier, clerk of court of said parish, do hereby certify that no statement or copy of any statement made by any commissioner of election or supervisor of registration, or any other person, of any riot, tumult, or acts of violence, intimidation or disturbance, bribery or corrupt influences, at any place within said parish, or at or near any poll or voting-place or place of registration, during, at, or before, or after the general election held on Tuesday the 7th day of November, 1876, has been delivered to me, the clerk of court of said parish, or filed in my office by any supervisor of registration, commissioner of election, or any other person whatever. Nor has any statement or copy of statement been delivered to me or filed in my office by any supervisor of registration, commissioner of election, or any other person, of any such riots, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation and disturbance, bribery or corrupt influences, at any place within said parish, or at or near any poll or voting-place or place of registration or revision of registration. And I do hereby further certify that no notice or protest, or any complaint of any riot, intimidation, tumult, violence, disturbance, bribery or corrupt influences at any poll or place of registration, or at any other place in said parish, has been delivered to me or filed in my office up to this date.

Given under my official signature and seal of office, at Clinton, said parish, this 20th of November, 1876.

[SEAL.] JOHN S. LANIER,
Clerk of Court.

The vote of this parish, about which so much has been said, was rejected; and yet here is the proof made by the clerk of the parish that no statement was ever filed of any wrong-doing in that parish on the day of election, not only within the twenty-four hours, as insisted upon by the Senator from Ohio, but at any time. At no time was there a statement filed as required by law, and yet the vote of that parish was rejected. Affidavits signed and sworn to by from two to three hundred persons are in the book, and made by the leading men of the parish.

The disturbances and subsequent lawlessness in the parish of East Feliciana have their commencement in the late part of the summer of 1875. At that time there was no political excitement, and no election held or to be held.

In the part of the parish bordering East Baton Rouge and West Feliciana, bands of men, not in any regular organization, but squads in different localities, collected together and attempted to put a stop to the sale of cotton in the seed, which had grown to be a serious matter even to both planters and merchants who supplied them.

There was no law in our State that could reach the evil. An attempt to pass such law had failed. These squads or bands of men went around and first warned the traffickers to cease the business; as the season advanced the evil commenced again, and the lawlessness first took the shape of burning the shops engaged in the trade. A number were so burned, more in East Baton Rouge and West Feliciana.

These bands increased; stealing generally, and especially hogs and cattle, was next endeavored to be stopped in like manner. A spirit of general lawlessness then prevailed during the fall and winter of 1875, but it was wholly unconnected with any political election or movement.

The stores burned in nearly all instances belonged to white men and democrats. I know of instances in which they did not. White men suffered alike with colored. A number of white men were ordered to leave the parish because accused of stealing. These men were connected with the democratic party. The negroes were often caught and punished for theft. This lawlessness and these bands of men, attempting to right wrongs which did exist, had their apologist because the State government was imbecile and inefficient. The courts were not held, and excuses were made that evils such as existed had to be corrected. Men began under these circumstances to vent their personal spite, and in some instances on both whites and blacks alike. The well-disposed people wanted the lawlessness checked, and yet it was still justified by some, as there was no other remedy for many of the evils.

At the commencement of the present year, 1876, the conservative people of the parish of themselves and unaided by the State government appealed to all classes to cease this state of things. A more conservative feeling was aroused, and acts of violence became less frequent. It was not until spring had passed that any election excitement commenced. At the primary election, held early in July, the conservative element as it was understood prevailed. The canvass was immediately opened, and the candidates advocated a union with the colored voters, and to cooperate with them. This was opposed by some, but joint clubs white and colored openly advocated and were formed everywhere. The appeal to the colored element was to help us change the government, and return to a better order of things. The colored leaders, after the nomination of General Nicholls, joined us willingly. The white radical leaders did not number three all told. They had no influence with the colored people. The canvass soon showed the people were one way. Numbers who were reluctant and would probably prefer to remain republicans had they had any leadership went with the mass. It was soon seen there was to be no republican opposition. They put no ticket forward in the parish. The supervisor and white leaders made overtures to divide the offices and put a Congressman and a member of the Legislature in the field and make a joint ticket; in that way all overtures were rejected. They had but one meeting, that a failure as far as securing any following. It was uninterrupted; both Judge Lyons and the writer spoke at the meeting, two colored radicals answering us. The supervisor of the parish left, and many colored and white, a majority colored men, were denied registration. The republicans placed no ticket in the field, had no tickets distributed at the polling-places, refused to vote when tickets were obtained for them. It was charged openly a week before the election at one of our largest meetings that their plan was to abstain from voting, and to get the colored men to remain away. Not a single disturbance occurred on the day of election. Not a single commissioner at the polls has reported one. It was as peaceable a day as ever passed. No armed bodies save the three detachments of United States troops were in the parish. Their troops were in easy distance of every poll. No act to hinder or disturb registration occurred, save the act of the supervisor, who left and deprived 400, mostly colored, from getting their proper papers. During the time of registration, seventy-seven days before the election, no violence occurred, save a little instance of outrage I heard had been reported, which act resulted in the defeat of a candidate on the democratic ticket, who was accused with being connected with it, both white and colored voting against him.

The year 1875, in which the lawlessness was in vogue, was not election year. There was no political excitement. The man Gair of whom so much has been said, who was taken from a sheriff's posse, had been beaten by his party in 1874, many white conservatives voting for him. He was killed in October, 1875, and was accused of being accessory in poisoning a physician. This act was never connected with politics until it became necessary for it to be used as a political outrage. The supervisor of registration himself, when I insisted on his return to our parish more than a week previous to the election, gave as a reason for not complying that the intention was not to count our vote.

CHARLES McVEA.

STATE OF LOUISIANA,
Parish of East Feliciana:

Personally appeared before the undersigned authority L. Baynes Morgan, of ward No. 5, said parish, who, being sworn, says that he was United States supervisor of said ward, appointed by Federal court, and officiated as such at the election held on the 7th of November last; that the election was perfectly peaceable and quiet; that there was no intimidation whatever; that two colored men, to wit, Samuel Lee and Aaron Dawson, remarked in presence of witness that they could not vote because they could not get regular republican tickets; witness told them that he was United States supervisor; that they had a right to vote as they pleased and would be protected in so doing; and he offered to write their tickets for them; Samuel Lee afterward voted the democratic ticket and Aaron Dawson refused to vote in spite of assurances of witness.

S. B. MORGAN.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this November 17, 1876.
[SEAL.] JOHN S. LANIER,
Clerk of Court.

It will be remembered that the Senator from Ohio made a great point about this parish because no republican votes were cast in it. The reasons are given at length in this testimony why there were no republican votes. The republicans, finding that the parish would be carried by the democrats by a large majority because a large number of colored men had signified their intention to vote the democratic ticket, adopted the plan not to vote at all so that they might lay the foundation for the rejection of the entire vote of the parish. The vote was rejected, although the clerk of the parish proves that no statement was filed with him as required by the law. In addition to this I have before me the testimony of one hundred and thirty odd persons, going from page 456 to page 643, of the same character, proving that peace, quiet, and good order prevailed at the election; that there never was an election held in any portion of the United States where more peace and quiet prevailed, and the reason why no republican votes were cast in that parish is because they found out they were to be outvoted by the democrats, and adopted as a policy that which is well explained in the testimony of the gentleman which has been read. They put no ticket in the field.

What becomes of the point made by the Senator from Ohio in this parish in which he attempted to show fraud, intimidation, and violence to such an extent that the republicans in the parish did not dare to vote? Here is proof overwhelming that they were asked to vote but they had no candidate in the parish and wanted none because they knew that the parish was democratic; and it was a plan laid at that time, a conspiracy to throw out that vote, and it was accordingly thrown out.

I will now read the testimony from East Baton Rouge, page 143 and 340:

General HERRON, (of Baton Rouge.) Two of the boxes returned by two of the commissioners; although they were returned to the supervisor, the vote did not appear upon this consolidated statement, from the fact that the statement, tally-sheets, &c., were sealed up in the box, but the duplicate originals of the returns were filed in the clerk's office. It is only an error on the part of the supervisor in both cases, and it should have been his duty to supply the missing polls. That error was only found out after the supervisor had left Baton Rouge for New Orleans. Hence the request from us that these boxes should be brought here for the purpose of being opened by the board and the returns from those polls taken from them, and included in the consolidated report before this board. I understood that, as it appears from this consolidated statement, seven boxes have been omitted, and these boxes have been placed in the keeping of the deputy clerk and the United States supervisor. It seems to me that justice demands that these boxes should be opened and the returns from these different polls compiled in accordance with law.

Governor WELLS. The board has already decided that they will not receive any returns except from the supervisors of registration. The court has said that the returning board should not receive any returns except from the properly constituted officers, and they tried to compel this board to receive returns from other parties by mandamus. The court said that the board had no authority to receive them except through the proper sources, therefore the case is settled. The board cannot accept any returns except those from the supervisor of registration. If there are returns forwarded to this board by any other persons, or even by the commissioners, and if they have been declared to be informal by the supervisor of registration, the board have a right to reject them. They must go through the supervisor of registration; that has been settled by the courts. That should be the ruling of the board, and there is no use to go over the question again.

Yet in the face of this decision, in other cases the board did receive and open the boxes from republican parishes. This was on application of a committee of gentlemen who came down from East Feliciana for that purpose; stating that the commissioner of election had fraudulently locked up the tally-sheets in the boxes where the votes were and the supervisor withheld them and would not deliver them in the city of New Orleans, and in truth they were not delivered. An application was made to send to get the original vote, which was denied, while in other cases where it suited the republican side it was allowed.

BATON ROUGE, November 16, 1876

GENTLEMEN: In compliance with your request of this morning, I take pleasure to furnish you the following account of my personal observations of the manner in which the election was conducted here on the 7th instant, and how the canvass of the votes has been conducted since.

I was present on the morning of election day when a report was made to my commanding officer, Lieutenant Charles Brooks, of a difficulty about appointment of commissioners at the Murphy school-house poll, and I accompanied him to a conference between leaders of both political parties. I saw and bear witness to the fact that the representatives of the democratic party did all in their power to make a fair arrangement of the matter possible. Before a conclusion was arrived at I proceeded with Dr. Dupré, democrat, and C. Le Sage, republican, to the third ward polling-place, to investigate a report made by one Shields, (colored,) who stated that he had been roughly handled, and ejected from the room where the ballot-box was located by one Duncan, although he, Shields, was a United States deputy marshal.

We rode out there (six miles from the city) at a very rapid gait. While en route Le Sage stated that upon the least sign of intimidation, he would, as supervisor, close the polls. To such a proceeding Dr. Dupré objected, as Le Sage had accompanied us simply in his private character as a representative of the republican party. Upon my remarking that such a course was not expected when Colonel Brooks directed me to investigate the facts jointly with him, Le Sage, and Dr. Dupré, and that I would, if necessary, remain and see peace kept there until I could get further instructions by sending back a mounted orderly I had with me, Le Sage abandoned the idea. Upon our arrival at the polls, I found everything perfectly peaceable. Excepting Le Sage, who carried a pistol, and my orderly, I saw no armed men there. There were no arms in the house where the ballot-box was located. All persons present were sober and orderly. After careful investigation particularly among colored men present, and after hearing the statement of the republican commissioner, whom I saw alone, I became satisfied that the story of the negro Shields was false. On the opening of the poll he had entered the room where the ballot-box was located, and was removed therefrom by order of the commissioners, (who were enforcing the rule, that one voter should at any time be within thirty feet of the box,) by one Duncan, who was acting officially, as supervisor or constable. Upon asserting that he (Shields) was a deputy marshal, he was requested by the republican commissioner and Duncan to return, and assured that he should not be molested, but left nevertheless, stating that he was going to the barracks to report them and send the military after them. I was treated by all present with the utmost courtesy. No one attempted to prevent a free and full investigation, nor could I perceive any displeasure on account of my calling aside colored men and examining them alone. Le Sage assured me himself that he was convinced Shields had made an utterly false report. In returning and going, I watched closely all roads in sight, and I failed to see any pickets anywhere. Every colored man I met assured me that he had not been molested going to or coming from town. I was particularly struck with the friendly feeling that existed among the whites and negroes gathered near the polls, and the republican commissioner assured me he apprehended no trouble. Upon inquiry he further told me that as most of the supporters of the republican ticket had been ordered by their leaders to town to vote, but few republican votes would be cast there. Upon returning to town I was met by stories (told by radical politicians) that an express had heralded our coming to the men at the third ward, that a man had been shot there, &c. The gait at which I rode going to the the place made the former impossible, and I could not find the wounded man, who was said to be in town, in spite of my making diligent inquiry. I have seen an article in the New Orleans Republican of the 15th instant relative to affairs in the third ward, and I am free to say that the statement therein made is utterly false, to the best of my knowledge. After returning from the country and reporting to my commanding officer, I visited frequently every voting-place in the city. Everywhere voting was quietly progressing. Excepting attempts to coax black men to vote the democratic ticket, no attempt was made to influence their action. I failed to see any ground for the complaint made to me repeatedly by republican politicians that it was dangerous for a man to vote the republican ticket. The utmost care appeared to have been taken to preserve the peace, and the authority of the United States was nowhere questioned. On the contrary, when it became necessary to confer with civil powers, they showed the utmost willingness to do what was correct and fair. Upon a complaint being made by Deputy Marshal McAlpin that he was annoyed in the performance of his duty near the court-house voting place by the city police stationed about there, they were at once withdrawn by order of the mayor, and when, by some misunderstanding of orders, they again went into the hall, the mayor and chief of police went in person and superintended their removal.

One thing was quite apparent, the democratic side worked hard, by all fair means, to induce colored men to vote their ticket, while but little effort to the same end was perceptible on the part of their opponents. I remained near the different polls until late at night and convinced myself by actual observation that the count was progressing fairly, and that no danger need be feared of any interference by unauthorized parties. About one a. m., on the morning of the 8th, I was called from my bed and directed by my commanding officer to go to the court-house and see what action was required to protect the deputy marshal and officers of election there, it having been reported to him that they were in danger of being interfered with. Upon arriving there I found the deputy marshal, McAlpin, quite excited. I told him he need not fear anything. Upon this he remarked that a crowd could come in and kill him before any aid could be had from the garrison; that he had heard parties say in the yard "their majority here won't do them much good," (referring to republican votes cast there.) Beyond this and the fact that some members of the democratic party had been there to witness the count, I could find no reason for his fears. To assure him, however, I requested the chief of police to station some men near to prevent the approach of unauthorized parties, and he complied promptly by detailing picked men for that duty. I myself remained until after four a. m., when I left, sending a sergeant to take my place; he, in turn, was relieved by nine a. m. Neither myself nor the non-commissioned officers on duty could see any, even the most remote, cause for uneasiness on the score of the safety of the election officers or ballots. The count was peaceably completed at the other places in town. I, again, by order, was present during the greater part of the time while Mr. Clover was compiling the returns made by local commissioners. He was treated with perfect courtesy by all men of the democratic party who had business with him. They made every effort to comply with his directions, and, in spite of very impolite treatment they received at the hands of some of Mr. Clover's subordinates, (I was present when this occurred several times,) they kept their tempers and acted very fair, indeed.

While on this duty I saw the only real case of intimidation which has come to my personal notice since I have been in Baton Rouge. Mr. Guy Samuels, a native of Virginia, and now a planter near Port Hudson, was approached by a negro, when outside of the court-house, where he, Samuels, had been on duty in connection with election matters in his ward. The negro used the most abusive language imaginable. Mr. Samuels assured him that any fears on account of political opinions or actions he might have were groundless, and invited him to come and gather his crop, offering him a place to sleep in his own dwelling while there, and promised to protect him. All this had no effect, and the negro continued his threats and abuse, his manner showing that he relied on my presence there for impunity from the punishment at Mr. Samuel's hands he rightly deserved. While on duty guarding Mr. Clover and the deputy marshal against apprehended dangers I was always unarmed. At no time was there, as far as I could perceive, any necessity for my presence. I am convinced now that under any ordinary circumstances my uniform as United States officer is sufficient protection against any violence, in performing any duty, such as assisting a marshal in making an arrest, or the like.

I have above given simply a statement of what I saw myself. I have purposely avoided making any remarks on the conduct of the officers sent here to conduct the election, although it appeared strange to me that they should be on the most intimate terms with leaders and candidates for office on the republican side, and consult with them often in the course of their official labors. The following facts should, however, be well known.

While on duty at the court-house, I was approached in a very confidential manner by one Baranco, colored, who had, if my memory is correct, acted in some capacity at the engine-house poll, and who claims to be a deputy United States marshal. He informed me that they (the radicals) had fixed the democrats by locking up tally-sheets and other papers in the ballot-boxes in places where a democratic majority was cast. I was also informed later by Mr. Clover that he had completed his returns so far as he could under instructions, excepting some remarks he kept in his head, which he would add after he got safely in the city, (New Orleans.)

That the statement I have here made may be correctly judged, I will state that I have never been an active partisan of any political party. I have been in the United States Army continuously since 1856, and a reference to my testimony given before a congressional committee in New Orleans in 1875, with a letter published in the appendix to their report, will show that I have always pleaded for the rights of the negro.

Going back a short time, when the canvass was in full blast, I attended a democratic meeting held here, followed by a barbecue. I there noticed that the negroes were fully impressed with the arguments there advocated; that they liked and believed the promises made to them regarding schools and other privileges. I have been assured by several negroes that they voted the democratic ticket because they were satisfied their master's (employer's) interests were their own, and because they did not like men put on the republican ticket.

Many more reasons were given me in detail for similar action (turning democrat) by negroes who approached me confidentially asking advice how they should vote at the approaching election.

Giving you my free consent to use this statement in any manner you desire, I am, gentlemen, your obedient servant,

WM. GERLACH,
Second Lieutenant Fifth Infantry, United States Army.

NOVEMBER 17, 1876.

W. G. SAMUEL, being duly sworn, deposes and says:

To first interrogatory. I reside in the fifth ward, parish of East Baton Rouge; I am thirty-five years of age, and a planter.

To second interrogatory. I have been a democrat ever since I became of age.

To third interrogatory. I was United States supervisor at poll No. 1, ward 5, in said parish, on election day, November 7, 1876. The election at said precinct was fairly and quietly conducted and all parties expressed themselves satisfied; all had a fair and full opportunity to cast their votes for any candidates. There was no disturbance of any description and no armed men were present so far as I know. I think twenty republican tickets were cast at said poll, and many were voted openly.

To fourth interrogatory. I heard no threats or abuse against persons so voting the republican ticket, and know of no intimidation of such votes.

To fifth interrogatory. I know of many colored men in said precinct who voted the democratic ticket, and the reason given by these, so far as I heard same, was that they wanted to establish a more and a better government. There was no compulsion in the case whatever.

To sixth interrogatory. I have carefully read the answer of Dr. J. W. Dupré to this interrogatory, and adopt the same as my answer hereunto.

To seventh interrogatory. F. A. Clover was the supervisor of registration for said parish; he was not a resident of said parish. I never saw him till he came in with the returns, and do not know when he came or left.

To eighth interrogatory. I have heard of L. C. Lesage frequently; he is a resident of said parish. I have no personal acquaintance with him, but do know his general reputation for truth and veracity to be bad, so bad that I could not believe him under oath.

To ninth interrogatory. I have not.

To tenth interrogatory. I do not.

To eleventh interrogatory. I know of no such armed bodies of men patrolling the parish, and do not believe there were such.

To twelfth interrogatory. I know of no such occurrences, and do not believe there were such.

To thirteenth interrogatory. I do not, and never heard of any, and would have been sure to have heard of such occurrences, had there been such.

To fourteenth interrogatory. I have made such examination, and am confident that the statements were known to be false when made.

To fifteenth interrogatory. I knew nothing of it except from hearsay.

To sixteenth, seventeenth, eighteenth, nineteenth interrogatories. I have carefully examined the answers of Dr. J. W. Dupre to the interrogatories, and adopt the same as my own, except as to any matters personal to said affiant.

To twentieth interrogatory. On the day of election I heard one Jones, a deputy United States marshal on duty at my poll, say to the colored people that unless they voted the republican ticket they would be hunted down with negro dogs; he got so boisterous that Mr. Janney, a candidate for the Legislature on the democratic ticket, reproved him therefor.

To twenty-first interrogatory. I do not know said parties.

W. G. SAMUEL.

WM. H. HOLMES,
Second Justice of the Peace, Parish of Orleans, Louisiana.

The man who gives this testimony was supervisor of the parish of East Baton Rouge. That parish played quite a conspicuous part in this contest. I have read enough to show in what way the election was carried there. It was peaceable, quiet, and orderly. I have read the report of Lieutenant Gerlach, an officer of the United States Army, giving all the details. I could read much more testimony and answers to interrogatories propounded to other parties, extending over many pages of this book. I have read enough to show I think to anybody who is disposed to be satisfied on unquestionable evidence, that the election in East Baton Rouge was fairly conducted; that there was no intimidation, no violence, nothing done of an irregular character, and furthermore I have shown that no statement from that parish was made in accordance with the law.

I read now from Grant Parish, the testimony as to which begins on page 648:

COLFAX, September 29, 1876.

DEAR SIR: Inclosed you will find my oath of office as United States supervisor of election, parish of Grant. I have but little knowledge of my duties except what I learn from newspaper extracts. Please forward instructions, blanks, &c.

What can be done with parties illegally registered, (minors, for instance;) by what proceeding and before what authority should they be taken; justice of the peace, parish or district judge, or United States commissioner? Who is D. A. Ward, our imported supervisor? He promises very fair, but does not comply; goes to different points, but goes at such times and such places with such limited notices as tail to get the people out in democratic localities. He has refused to register voters of foreign birth whose parents were naturalized while the applicants were minors, because they could not produce their parents' papers. Can such parties vote by affidavit before United States commissioner? If yea, send me blank form, &c.

What steps can we take to remove Ward, if any? When making circuit through parish, he promised to stop at certain points; swears he did do so; but, fact is, he only stopped and breakfasted, and left before any one arrived, (seven a. m.;) would not wait for hands in the field to come to house, say half mile, who had been sent for. Let me hear from you soon.

Yours, truly,

W. L. RICHARDSON.

Major E. A. BURKE.

Respectfully referred to W. R. Whitaker, esq. Please prepare a reply at your leisure.

NEW ORLEANS, October 6, 1876.

GRANT PARISH, LA., October 6, 1876.

DEAR SIR: Immediate steps should be taken to prevent further frauds being committed by the supervisor of registration, one D. T. Ward, a former roper in of the New Orleans snake show at the foot of Canal street. It is well known here that he has registered a large number of negroes not eighteen years of age, and it is evident he intends committing other frauds, since he positively refuses to permit W. L. Richardson, regularly commissioned United States supervisor of election, to examine his books until ten days after the election has taken place. We are determined to do nothing that could be construed into intimidation, therefore we appeal to you for advice. Has a United States supervisor of election a right to examine registration books, and what course must be pursued to enforce this right? On the 28th day of September last the registrar closed his office at or about eleven a. m., proceeded about three quarters of a mile therefrom to a radical barbecue, and it was only after repeated efforts I succeeded in getting him to return at four p. m. to his office to register two white men.

Appended you will find a list of his notices, showing that he spent but nine days in the pine hills or white part of the parish, and three of these were consumed in traveling. It is a known fact that the white voters largely outnumber the black, though this fellow is spending all of his time in ward 1, entirely a negro ward. Heretofore the supervisors have spent not more than twelve days in this ward, using the balance of the time in going from place to place to give the whites an opportunity to register. The negroes are all congregated on plantations in ward 1, the farthest not twelve miles distant from Colfax, whereas the whites are scattered over a large territory, in the hills. Please reply by Durfee.

Respectfully,

THOMAS HICKMAN.

Colonel PATTON.

ROOMS EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE,
New Orleans, October 10, 1876.

Respectfully referred to the committee on registration with request to give the matter immediate attention and reply to this communication.

LOUIS BUSH, Chairman.

DEAR SIR: Yours of 4th instant to A. L. Grow, esq., chairman our committee, relative to my appointment as Unietd States supervisor, is before me. I forwarded my oath of office some ten days ago; hope it has been received before this time. I have accomplished very little as yet. D. A. Ward, our supervisor, is so insulting that I cannot talk to him. He refuses to give or permit me to make a list of registration, and continues to make such use of books as to prevent me from getting copy; keeps them in private room at his office, and no chance for me to write without interfering in his pretended business. I will try, however, to get the list. Whole number now, including erasures, 1,260; he says about twenty white majority. As soon as I can get list will compare and report.

Ward says he is chief of election in this parish and will do as he pleases; says he can have as many or as few polling places as he pleases; says he is not bound to put one in each justice of the peace ward; says he can make the erasure from registration-book after 28th instant, two or three days before election, &c. He is now making out accounts for fees, incidental expenses, and has his bill and clerks already approved by Kellogg, &c.

What can I do in event he refuses to put boxes in each justice of the peace ward or at such place as most convenient, &c.; also what shall I do in event he makes erasures after legal time for closing book, namely, October 28?

You say some instructions will be published in Democrat, commencing on 6th instant, and then continue till after election, &c. Please send me a copy at this place, (Colfax.) I am a subscriber to Weekly Democrat, but my paper goes to Montgomery, where I live. I shall remain at this point (Colfax) until after the election, and all communications relative to my duties as United States supervisor of elections, campaign papers, &c., should be sent here.

I do not like appearances in our parish (Grant) much, though we will give the ticket a majority if we get a fair chance and have fair count.

Respectfully,

W. L. RICHARDSON.

Major E. A. BURKE.

NEW ORLEANS, October 23, 1876.

DEAR SIR: Please consider the points presented within, and see if this election notice conforms to the law as defined in act No. 98 of 1872 and October 7, 1875.

This ward is crooked, and I would ask you to read the letter carefully and see whether he is in violation of the law.

Respectfully,

E. A. BURKE,
Chairman Committee.

W. R. WHITAKER, Esq.

Interrogatories for democratic-conservative candidates, in the matter of Grant Parish, on W. L. Richardson, E. A. Burke, Frank McGloin, witnesses.

Interrogatory 1. What is your name and age, and where do you reside?

Interrogatory 2. Do you know anything of the election held in said parish, November 7, 1876? If so, state how it was held; whether it was full, fair, and peaceable.

Interrogatory 3. Do you know anything of registration and its conduct? If so, what?

Interrogatory 4. Do you know anything of the peace of said parish during election or previous? If so, what do you know?

Interrogatory 5. Do you know anything of intimidation or threats; and, if so, what, and by whom?

Interrogatory 6. Do you know anything of the departure of the supervisor of registration; and, if so, when did he leave, why did he leave, and what was done by you in relation thereto?

Interrogatory 7. Do you know anything of the political affairs in said parish previous to or at said election?

H. C. BROWN,
CHAS. CAVANAC,
H. M. SPOFFORD,
J. R. ALEX. GAUTHREAUX,
FRANK McGLOIN,
Of Counsel.

FRANK MCGLOIN, sworn, doth make answer to the interrogatories to him propounded in this matter, as follows:

To the first. My name is Frank McGloin; my age thirty; my residence, New Orleans.

To the second. I do not, except from hearsay.

To the third. I do not, except from hearsay.

To the fourth. I visited said parish in October, 1876, twice; first about the 8th or 9th. I passed through the parish from Cotile to Montgomery. I was there again on October 16, 1876, at the democratic barbecue. I saw every appearance of peace and quiet. I saw the best and kindliest relations between whites and blacks. At our barbecue I saw numbers of colored men, who listened attentively to the speaking, showing, some of them, marked evidence of concurrence and approval. I met negroes who openly avowed their democracy. The only intimidations I witnessed in Grant Parish were at the hands of republicans, exercised against colored democrats, who had been sent there under my protection. These colored men were threatened with arrest, and I had to hurry out of the parish until I could perfect arrangements to guarantee their safety.

To the fifth. No further than what is embodied above.

To the sixth. Nothing, except from hearsay.

To the seventh. Nothing further than which I have stated in my answer to the fourth.

FRANK McGLOIN.

W. T. HOUSTON,
First Justice of the Peace for the Parish of Orleans.

Answers to interrogatories propounded to E. A. Burke, for the democratic and conservative candidates in the matter of Grant Parish.

First. My name is E. A. Burke; age thirty-five years; reside in New Orleans.

Second. I know by correspondence of the registrar of election in Grant Parish. I have been convinced by my correspondents, by assurances of citizens of said parish, and by the statement of the supervisor of registration, D. A. Ward, on the 14th day of November; said Ward stated to me that he arrived in Grant Parish on the morning of November 7; that the election was fair, full, and peaceable; and he gave me a certificate to that effect, a copy of which I attach hereto and make a part hereof.

Third and fourth. Answered above.

Fifth. No.

Sixth. The supervisor of registration of Grant Parish left the parish before the close of registration, ostensibly to get ballot-boxes, actually for the purpose of adjusting some private affairs in New Orleans; so informed me here on or about the 2d of November. He stated to me that he was not driven from the parish, and assured me of his intention to return and hold the election, and was not at all apprehensive of any danger. I believe that said supervisor was in the parish of Grant, upper portion ward 6, on election day, and was informed by him that he left there on the night of election. Mr. Ward informed me, November 14, that polling-places had been designated by public advertisement and commissioners appointed, and that he was called away upon important business, but would make his returns in due season.

Seventh. Answered above.

E. A. BURKE.

Sworn to and subscribed before me at New Orleans on the 1st of December, 1876.

EMMETT D. CRAIG,
Commissioner of United States Circuit Court, District of Louisiana.

Answers of W. L. Richardson to interrogatories propounded by the democratic-conservative candidates in the matter of contest of the election in the parish of Grant, Louisiana, on the 7th November, 1876.

Answer to first interrogatory. My name is Wilson Lyon Richardson; my age is about forty-three years; my residence is in the town of Montgomery, parish of Grant, State of Louisiana.

Answer to second interrogatory. The election in Grant Parish, November 7, 1876, was full, fair, free, and peaceable, both parties polling a larger vote than at any election ever held in the parish since its organization, (1869;) it was a common expression of leading men in both parties that they had never witnessed a more peaceable and fair election anywhere; the State supervisor of registration, D. A. Ward, left the parish without any known cause; the election was held by the commissioners indicated by the supervisor, D. A. Ward, at the several poll or voting places established by him prior to his departure.

Answer to third interrogatory. The registration was quite full, though the democrats were put to considerable inconveniences. I know of but one or two applicants unquestionably entitled to registration that were rejected; these are democrats. Some 30 or 40 republicans registered that are believed to be under twenty-one years of age; these men, however, were permitted to vote, except one (Mr. Vance) who refused to swear to his age before the commissioners. I feel confident that there are not more than 60 or 70 unregistered voters in the parish legally entitled to registration. Of the number registered at least three fourths, if not four-fifths, are democrats, the majority of whom would have registered if the supervisor had remained until October 20. The total registration numbers 1,286; of this number 58 were erased by Ward, the supervisor, consisting of 46 whites and 12 colored; this leaves 1,225 still on the registration books, which preponderates 50 in favor of the whites. There now remains on the books some 50 or 60 names, nearly all republicans, (colored,) that should be erased, they having died or removed from the parish. The supervisor told me he would attend to them on the 28th of October. None of these colored men who had removed appeared or attempted to vote in the parish on the 7th of November, 1876; neither the whites.

Answer to fourth interrogatory. The people in the parish of Grant were profoundly peaceable during the entire registration and election. The political parties had some confusion among themselves, but a far better feeling existed and does now exist between the parties or races than has ever been the case heretofore since the organization of the parish.

Answer to fifth interrogatory. I know of no intimidation of any kind, and feel fully aware that none existed; indeed, none would have been permitted among the democrats. If any could have existed at all it was confined to the colored republicans toward the colored democrats; but I do not believe any existed then, for if such had been the case I certainly would have heard of it.

Answer to sixth interrogatory. I know nothing about the supervisor leaving the parish except that he did leave on the 20th day of October. I heard he left Colfax on that day, and I have not seen him since. As to the causes why he left I can only conjecture. That from what I heard he had said, from what he telegraphed he had left for, and from letters which I saw from him to Jenks in Colfax, written after he left, that he, Ward, had only but one object: that of preventing the count of or recognition of the half-expressed will of the majority of the voters of the parish. I did nothing on account of his leaving except to report the same to Major E. A. Burke, chairman of democratic committee on registration and election, and to assure the people composing both parties that it was the privilege and duty of every law-abiding American citizen to vote and to do so according to the honest dictate of his own conscience, and that law, equity, and justice would accord them a fair count by the returning officers of the State, and to make a joint written request with S. C. Curry, republican United States supervisor of election, to the commissioners of election to proceed with their duties and to hold the election in all respects as prescribed by law. I am and was the democratic United States supervisor of election in Grant Parish, and we signed the aforesaid request officially.

Answer to seventh interrogatory. At the election in Grant Parish on November 7, 1876, and for some twelve months preceding, the people of both parties have been exceedingly quiet and peaceable. A very kindly and friendly feeling existed between both parties and both races, and which I have already fully stated above in fourth answer. Prior to that time the political affairs of the parish is of historic record, and not necessary for me to describe or try to answer further, except at each poll two of the commissioners represented the republican party and one the democratic party.

Justice of the Peace for the Parish of Orleans.

I call the attention of the Senate again to the fact that Grant Parish is also one of those rejected by the returning board. I have read the testimony of the supervisor of the parish.

I read now from La Fayette Parish, beginning on page 654.

STATE OF LOUISIANA,
Parish of La Fayette:

I, August Monnier, clerk of court for the parish of La Fayette, do hereby certify that the election returns from all the polls or voting places in said parish, of the election held on the 7th day of November, 1876, have been deposited with me in my office, as required by law; and I furthermore certify that no declaration or statement of any riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, and disturbance, bribery or corrupt influences at any place within said parish, or at or near any poll or voting-place, or place of registration or revision of registration, has been made or filed with me, when or since the aforesaid election returns were deposited with me by any of the commissioners of election, at any of the polls or voting-places of said parish, or by any supervisors of registration in said parish, or by any other person, such as is contemplated by the twenty-sixth section of act No. 98 of the Legislature, entitled "An act to regulate the conduct and to maintain the freedom and purity of elections; to prescribe the mode of making returns thereof; to provide for the election of returning officers, and defining their powers and duties; to prescribe the mode of entering on the rolls of the senate and house of representatives, and to enforce article 103 of the constitution," approved November 20, 1872.

[Parts of this document are illegible.]

In the matter of the affidavits and protest from the parish of La Fayette.

Statement of facts and argument on behalf of the democratic-conservative party.

The State census of 1875 shows the total population of La Fayette Parish to be: The vote of 1874 was, democratic, 976; republican, 530—total, 1,506. The registered vote of 1876 is, white, 1,380; colored, 939—total, 2,319. The vote polled was, republican, 660; democratic, 1,159.

These figures show an increase of above 20 per cent. in the republican vote of the parish. The republican increase is considerably above the democratic. What becomes of intimidation affidavits?

It is a well-known fact that the election returns from La Fayette Parish were in the city of New Orleans on the night of the 15th November, 1876. Counsel are informed, and herewith file, and make it a part of this argument, the affidavit of John Clegg, that returns were made up, the compiler's and clerk's statement was compiled and sworn to before the clerk of the parish of La Fayette, on the 15th instant.

On Monday the 20th November, 1876, the election returns were seen in this city by John Clegg, who had, acting as clerk for the supervisor, made the compilation —— and the compiled statement when seen by Clegg, on the 20th November, showed for the Tilden electors, 1,157, and for the Hayes electors, 661 votes. Upon that compiled statement, sworn to by the supervisor before leaving La Fayette Parish, and seen by Clegg on the 20th November, there appeared no protests of any kind; and there were no protests or grounds of complaint accompanying the returns.

On Tuesday, 21st November, J. A. Veazey, supervisor of registration, declared repeatedly that he had filed the returns; that he had the receipt of the clerk of returning officers; that he had filed no protests or complaints; that he had no reason to file any, and would not file any protest or complaint.

On Wednesday the 22d November, Supervisor Veazey returns to his home in the parish with above declarations upon his lips.

On the 24th November the board say, "La Fayette Parish returns not yet filed."

On the 25th November, Supervisor Veazey re-appears in New Orleans. La Fayette Parish returns come to light on the 27th November, are opened by this board; and the fact that there were any grounds of complaint or protests was not made known to counsel until late in the afternoon of that day, Wednesday, 27th November.

It then appears that the supervisor has made a new compilation of votes, filed a new consolidated statement, unlike, in fact, totally different from, the one filed in the office of the clerk of court for La Fayette Parish, and it appears from statements made when knowledge of frauds and complaints, that there are republican witnesses already in this city, and a contest prepared for by republicans even before the minutes of the returning board show the receipt of the returns.

Interrogatories are served upon democratic counsel on the 30th of November, and this board declares no new testimony will be received after four o'clock on the 1st of December.

Now, with the utmost expedition, it would require five days to send for and bring here witnesses from La Fayette Parish; and to produce rebutting testimony by four o'clock on the 1st of December is a physical impossibility. We are required to summon and take the testimony of witnesses residing two days' travel distant in the short space of twenty-four hours.

Can the board receive and act upon returns of election of this character? And will it adhere to a ruling or order which works such manifest injury and injustice? A blunderingly packed record, the ex parte affidavits of willing witnesses, a ruling of the board denying the right to produce rebutting testimony, the remarkably late date at which these charges are brought forward, and the perfect knowledge of facts contained in the record by arrangements before it sees the (?)

Mr. McCREERY. I yield for that purpose.

PRINTING OF ELECTORAL REPORT.

Mr. ANTHONY. I should like an opportunity to offer a resolution to print the report which has been made to-day. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to report this resolution and ask its present consideration:

Resolved, That 10,000 additional copies of the report of the committee on counting the electoral votes be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. WITHERS. Is that the report read to-day?

Mr. ANTHONY. The report read to-day.

Mr. COCKRELL. And the bill is to be part of it?

Mr. ANTHONY. The bill is part of the report. It will cost about $400.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 1016) for the relief of Virginia E. White, of Ohio County, West Virginia, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. BOOTH. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After nine minutes spent in executive session the doors were re-opened, and (at four o'clock and nineteen minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, January 18, 1877.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

COUNTING OF THE ELECTORAL VOTES.

Mr. WOODWORTH, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4453) to prescribe the manner in which the electoral vote for President and Vice-President shall be counted; which was read a first and second time, referred to the select committee on the counting of the electoral vote, and ordered to be printed.

VIRGINIA E. WHITE.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1016) for the relief of Virginia E. White, of Ohio County, West Virginia. And if I am allowed to make a statement for a moment, I think there will be no objection to its passage.

The SPEAKER. The bill must be read.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. It is simply to refund to the widow of a man a tax erroneously imposed upon him, and it has been reported favorably twice.

Mr. HALE. I reserve all points of order on the bill until it is read.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Virginia E. White, widow and executrix of Andrew White, deceased, who was administrator with the will annexed of Daniel Steenrod, deceased, $1,250, with interest thereon from the 12th day of May, 1865; said sum being the amount of tax erroneously and improperly assessed on income of the estate of Daniel Steenrod, deceased, and paid by the said Andrew White as the administrator of said estate, and since his death recovered of the said Virginia E. White as the executrix of said Andrew White by the residuary legatees of the said Daniel Steenrod.

Mr. HALE. I withdraw all objection.

Mr. COCHRANE. I desire to say that the bill as read is not the bill which came from the Committee of Claims. I believe that the provisions of the bill now read give interest. The report of the committee simply gives an allowance of $1,250.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. The committee report an amendment to the bill, striking out the interest. The committee recommended that the bill be amended by striking out the words "with interest thereon from the 12th day of May, 1865."

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the bill as reported by the committee and which the Chair holds in his hand does not, for some reason, contain that amendment.

Mr. COCHRANE. Well, it did contain the amendment, for I think I reported the amendment to it. The gentleman from West Virginia on behalf of this claimant does not ask any interest.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not doubt that the amendment was intended to be reported, but in some manner it has been omitted, and the Chair will therefore submit the amendment to the House.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. I move to strike out the words "with interest thereon from the 12th day of May, 1865."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COUNTING THE ELECTORAL VOTE.

Mr. KNOTT. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the unfinished business, being the motion to reconsider the vote by which the report of the committee to ascertain and report what are the privileges, powers, and duties of the House of Representatives in counting the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States.

The Clerk read the resolutions, as follows:

Resolved, First. That the Constitution of the United States does not confer upon the President of the Senate the power to examine and ascertain the votes to be counted as the electoral votes for President and Vice-President of the United States.

Second. That the only power which the Constitution of the United States confers upon the President of the Senate in respect to the electoral votes for President and Vice-President of the United States is to receive the sealed lists transmitted to him by the several electoral colleges, to keep the same safely, and to open all the certificates or those purporting to be such in the presence of the Senate and the House of Representatives.

Third. That the Constitution of the United States does confer upon the Senate and the House of Representatives the power to examine and ascertain the votes to be counted as the electoral votes.

Fourth. That in the execution of their power in respect to the counting of the electoral vote the House of Representatives is at least equal with the Senate.

Fifth. That in the counting of the electoral votes, no vote can be counted against the judgment and determination of the House of Representatives.

Sixth. That the committee have leave to sit again and report hereafter further matter for the consideration of the House.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I raise the question of consideration at this time in reference to the resolution just read. I think it would be better to wait until we hear from the joint committee upon this subject. There is a broad principle on which we act, that a majority of this House is not compelled to hear debate upon anything they do not want to hear. A proposition is made here to proceed to the consideration of a question that is debatable. It is competent under the rule for a member to raise the question of consideration even upon a report that contains a question of privilege, and that is what the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KNOTT] now calls up. It occurs to me this morning that it is better for us to hear from the joint committee, if they have a proposition to bring into the House; otherwise we will first decide the question and then get the evidence on this important question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to make a suggestion to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] which perhaps may induce him to waive his point; that is, that this question comes up now as unfinished business.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. It could not come up in that way. If I recollect aright, and I think the RECORD will bear me out, on yesterday the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KNOTT] called up the motion to reconsider. Then would have been the time for me to have raised the question of consideration. But there is one question of higher privilege than the question of consideration, and that is the motion to adjourn, which was then made by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] shutting me out of the right at that time to raise the question of consideration.

The SPEAKER. The motion to reconsider is of high privilege.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. It is next to the motion to adjourn. When the motion to reconsider was called up, then a motion to adjourn was made, which shut me out from raising the question of consideration. This is the earliest moment in which I could raise that question. Of course it is for the majority of the House to settle whether they will consider the question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is disposed to leave it to the majority. Yet the Chair thinks the RECORD would show that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KNOTT] was on the floor and recognized, and without proceeding to debate yielded for a motion to adjourn. That has been the usual practice with members for the purpose of being entitled to the floor when the consideration of the unfinished business is again resumed.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. It would have been utterly impossible for me to raise the question of consideration yesterday, pending the motion to adjourn. It must be in the power of the House to raise that question at some time. I could not possibly have done it last night, because the motion to adjourn was of higher privilege and shut me out.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will recollect that the RECORD shows that this matter comes over from yesterday as unfinished business. And after the consideration of a question has been entered upon, the gentleman will not certainly insist that he has the right to raise the question of consideration.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. O, but it was not debated at all; it was not even stated to the House by the Chair. The gentleman from Kentucky merely rose and called up the motion to reconsider, and without debating at all the motion to adjourn was made.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think there is any occasion for disagreement. The Chair will ask the Clerk to read from the RECORD.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. KNOTT. I rise to a privileged question. I call up the motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution reported by the select committee on the privileges, powers, and duties of the House of Representatives in counting the vote for President and Vice-President of the United States was recommitted to that committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the gentleman from Kentucky will give way, I will move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. BUCKNER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Will the consideration of this motion exclude the morning hour to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hold that it comes up as unfinished business.

Mr. HALE. Will the Chair allow me——

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I have made my point; I do not wish to consume time by debating it further.

Mr. KNOTT. I desire to know whether I have the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] had the right to the floor upon a parliamentary inquiry looking to a point of order. The gentleman is now off the floor, and the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. KNOTT.]

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The Chair must rule upon my point: I do not withdraw the point which I raised. I merely said when I took my seat that I did not wish to press my point by further debate. The point I distinctly made is this: that it must be within the power of a member to raise the question of consideration on every debatable proposition. I have raised that question in this case at the earliest moment when I could obtain the floor for that purpose, and it is now for the Chair to decide.

Mr. HALE. A word or two on this point of order simply. This motion to reconsider the vote by which a report was recommitted to a committee is an authorized and customary mode of bringing the matter again before the House, a privilege of which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KNOTT] very properly availed himself. That gentleman now seeks to bring up the subject, and claims the floor upon it, I presume, for the purpose of debating it. I take it that there can be no question but what that at some time the question of consideration may properly be raised, as it was this morning by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON.] Whether or not before that question is submitted to the House the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. KNOTT,] being upon the floor, has the right to use his hour in debating it, is a question for the Chair to decide. But surely, as it seems to me, the Chair cannot hold that upon bringing this matter before the House the question of consideration cannot be raised, either to be submitted to the House now or when the gentleman from Kentucky shall have occupied his hour. Otherwise this might be a method of preventing the House from saying whether or not it will consider the subject. And upon this point I wish to ask the gentleman from Kentucky whether he wishes now at this stage to precipitate the House to a vote upon this very important question when it is understood, I believe, that another committee having in hand all this subject and its results is ready to report. Does the gentleman from Kentucky wish to push this matter to a vote of the House, or (if he is willing to answer, I ask him courteously) does he only intend to use his hour in debating the question without forcing the House to a vote? which I think would not be a good thing to do. With the report of the other committee now in readiness, which is understood to exhaust this whole subject, (I do not say more ably than the report now before us,) I appeal to the gentleman whether he intends to push the House to a vote upon this question?

Mr. KNOTT. I supposed when I yielded to the gentleman from Indiana yesterday for a motion to adjourn that I would be entitled to the floor this morning in my own right, especially as the point was directly brought to the attention of the House by the question of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BUCKNER,] and I supposed that I would be entitled to an hour to-day. In reply to the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] I desire to say that I do not intend to ask the House to vote upon these resolutions now. I do not intend after I shall have said what I have to say on the subject to ask the House to take any course whatever, but to leave the matter entirely in their hands. If they should desire to come to a vote instantly, or to postpone the question, or to take any other action, I shall have no objection. I have never intimated that I intended to precipitate a vote, but, on the contrary, have said to every gentleman who has addressed me on this subject that it was my desire to have the fullest discussion and the most mature deliberation upon every question that should be presented by the committee on the privileges and powers of the House.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I want to call the attention of the Chair to a precedent which he can take into consideration before finally deciding this question. I recollect that at the last session, when the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LYNDE] had a matter relative to patents before the House, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SAYLER] being then our Speaker pro tempore, it was postponed to a certain day, when my colleague [Mr. SAMPSON] called up the motion to reconsider. The question of consideration was then raised on him, and he was denied the right to speak by a majority of the House.

Before taking my seat I wish to say that it is no part of my intention to cut off the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky—I always like to hear him speak—but I do not want this subject gone into at large before the general committee of the two Houses shall have reported.

Mr. HALE. Is there any objection to allowing the question of consideration to lie over, the point being reserved, until the gentleman from Kentucky has occupied his hour?

The SPEAKER. In the opinion of the Chair that could hardly be done. The Chair is very clear in the belief that at some time a member has the right to raise the question of consideration; nothing is more clear to the mind of the Speaker than that. The only question is whether the gentleman from Iowa has raised this point at the proper time. The Manual reads:

When any motion or proposition is made, the question "Will the House now consider it?" shall not be put, unless it is demanded by some member, or is deemed necessary by the Speaker.—Rule 41. And it is competent for a member to raise the question of consideration upon a report, even though a question of privilege is involved in the report. But after a question has been stated, and its discussion commenced, it is too late to raise the question of consideration.

This question, therefore, turns upon the matter of fact whether the gentleman from Iowa is in time in raising the question of consideration this morning, the resolutions having been called up yesterday. But the Chair recognizes also the fact that when the resolutions then came before the House a higher question was immediately raised, which was not by the rules debatable, that is, a motion to adjourn. If the gentleman from Iowa now states that yesterday he wished to raise the question of consideration, the Chair will entertain it.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I would have been out of order if I had raised it yesterday. That is the reason I did not do it.

The SPEAKER. Let us dispose of this one point before the Chair is asked to decide whether the gentleman would have been out of order yesterday.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. O, yes; I was watching yesterday and intending to raise the question.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House consider this subject at this time?

Mr. HALE. Will not unanimous consent be given that the question of consideration shall remain pending until the gentleman from Kentucky has occupied his hour, he having reported the resolutions and not having spoken upon them?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would not like to have that disposition made of the question.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I should object to it anyhow.

The SPEAKER. Now is the proper time to determine the question.

Mr. HALE. Then the question arises whether the House will agree to consider now this resolution as reported from the committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Iowa to state that he was watching on yesterday to raise the question of consideration, but was cut off by a motion to adjourn, the highest privileged motion which could then be entertained, and that was not debatable. Therefore the Chair feels bound after that statement to submit to the House to-day the question of consideration.

Mr. HALE. I ask the Chair to state distinctly what the question before the House is. Perhaps he will allow me to suggest that the resolutions be again read, so it may be seen by every member here and may be seen elsewhere what it is that the House is asked to do; what it is that the House is asked to consider in the face of what is coming upon us from another source.

The SPEAKER. That is not a point of order. The question now is, will the House consider the resolution reported from the committee on the privileges, powers, and duties of the House of Representatives in counting the vote for President and Vice-President of the United States?

Mr. HALE. Will the Chair have the resolutions again read? because when they were first read our attention was not specifically called to this matter.

The resolutions were again read.

Mr. HALE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Would a motion now be in order to postpone this subject for one week? I desire that because I wish the report of the other committee to come in first so we may consider it all at once.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the question is one of consideration.

Mr. HALE. But intervening, is not a motion to postpone a modification of the idea of consideration? It legitimately leads from that.

Mr. KNOTT. I rise to a question of order and insist that the question shall be put.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is very clear that the question before the House, as the Chair has already stated, is the question of consideration. The result which the Chair seems to desire can be reached by voting down the motion to consider the resolutions now before the House.

Mr. HALE. I am sincere in my desire for a postponement.

The SPEAKER. Not for a moment does the Chair doubt the gentleman's sincerity. The question before the House is, will the House proceed to the consideration of the resolutions reported from the committee on the privileges, powers, and duties of the House of Representatives in counting the vote for President and Vice-President of the United States? on which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KNOTT] is entitled to the floor.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 122, noes 72.

Mr. HALE. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 141, nays 81, not voting 67; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ainsworth, Anderson, Ashe, Atkins, Bagby, John H. Bagley, jr., Banning, Bland, Bliss, Blount, Bradford, Bright, John Young Brown, Buckner, Samuel D. Burchard, Cabell, John H. Wiley Wells, Wheeler, Whitehouse, Willard, Alpheus S. Williams, Willis, Woodburn, and Young—67.

So the House decided to consider the question.

During the vote,

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri, stated that his colleague, Mr. GLOVER, who was detained at home on account of sickness, would, if present, vote in the affirmative.

Mr. CABELL stated that his colleague, Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, was unavoidably detained from the session of the House this morning, and had paired with some gentleman on the other side.

Mr. FOSTER, of Ohio, stated that he was paired with the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. HARRIS, who would vote in the affirmative on this question, while he himself would vote in the negative.

Mr. BROWN, of Kentucky, stated that his colleague, Mr. BOONE, was detained from the House by sickness.

Mr. SPRINGER, Mr. HUNTON, and Mr. HOAR stated that they were not within the bar before the last name on the roll was called, but as they were absent in the service of the House they asked, by unanimous consent, leave to have their votes recorded.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri, moved to dispense with the reading of the roll-call.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The House has resolved to consider the resolutions reported by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KNOTT] on the privileges, powers, and duties of the House of Representatives in counting the vote for President and Vice-President of the United States, and on that question the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KNOTT] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. KNOTT. Mr. Speaker, whoever has carefully examined the proceedings of the convention which framed the Federal Constitution has doubtless been impressed by the fact that the proper method of electing the President and Vice-President of the United States was one of the most perplexing, as it was certainly one of the most momentous questions that challenged the attention or appealed to the patriotism of that illustrious assemblage. Called upon to provide for the periodic selection of a chief executive magistrate for a great and growing union of republics, together with one upon whom his high functions might devolve in certain contingencies, they appreciated the importance of devising a mode that should be the least liable to the disasterous effects of foreign influence, domestic turbulence, or political intrigue and corruption, while at the same time securing to the will of the people its legitimate influence in the choice of those to whom their most important interests were to be confided.

They were warned, however, by the uniform experience of nations, both ancient and modern, that it might frequently be difficult to secure a perfectly fair and peaceable popular election, especially if circumstances should arise involving a variety of conflicting interests presenting in their turn the strongest allurements to corrupt ambition, and exciting the fiercest appeals to passion and prejudice; besides considering it safer, as well as more in harmony with the general plan of the Union, to avoid that complete consolidation of the Government which, at least so far as it concerned the executive department, would be the immediate and necessary effect of submitting the choice of President and Vice-President to a direct vote of the people as a single community.

Accordingly, sir, after having considered a variety of plans, the convention finally adopted the method which has been substantially pursued since the organization of the Government, as the one best calculated to arrive as nearly as possible at a direct expression of the popular will with the least hazard of extraneous interference or domestic disturbance, while at the same time preserving as far as practicable the autonomy and equality of the several States. And, sir, so general was the approbation with which this plan was received, that while the friends of the new government regarded it with the most exalted satisfaction, as combining all the advantages that it could be desirable to unite, it was almost the only new feature in the system that escaped the severe animadversion of its opponents. The author of the sixty-seventh number of the Federalist, in a very elevated tone of enthusiasm, expressed the opinion that this "process of election affords a moral certainty that the office of President would never fall to the lot of any man who was not endowed in an eminent degree with the requisite qualifications. Talents," said he, "for low intrigue and the little arts of popularity may alone suffice to elevate a man to the first honors of a single State; but it will require other talents and a very different kind of merit to establish him in the esteem and confidence of the whole Union, or so considerable a portion of it as would be necessary to make him a successful candidate for the distinguished office of President of the United States. It will not be too strong to say that there will be a constant probability of seeing the station filled by characters pre-eminent for ability and virtue."

If this opinion has not been verified by subsequent experience, if indeed when read in the light of impartial, inexorable history it should seem to be the bitterest, cruelest irony that ever fell from the pen of man, it is perhaps to be attributed not so much to any intrinsic defect in the system as to a want of that constant jealousy, that untiring, unremitting, sleepless vigilance with which a free people should maintain their own rights and protect their own interests if they would perpetuate their liberties. For, sir, after all it is true, as was remarked by one of the most profound and thoughtful of all the distinguished commentators upon American jurisprudence, after summing up with consummate felicity the arguments in favor of our present electoral system, that—

> There is no other mode of appointing the Chief Magistrate, under all the circumstances peculiar to our political condition, which unites in itself so many unalloyed advantages.

Yet the same illustrious author, fifty years ago, predicted that—

> If ever the tranquillity of this nation is to be disturbed, or its liberties endangered by a struggle for power, it will be upon this very subject of the choice of a President. This—> is the question that is eventually to test the goodness and try the strength of the Constitution; and if we shall be able for half a century hereafter to continue to elect a Chief Magistrate of the Union with discretion, moderation, and integrity, we shall undoubtedly stamp the highest value on our national character, and recommend our republican institutions, if not to the imitation, yet certainly to the esteem and admiration of the more enlightened part of mankind.

How far the results of our presidential elections during the half century which has just elapsed may have commended our institutions to the admiration and esteem of mankind it is perhaps unnecessary to inquire, though it may reasonably be assumed, that no considerable number of intelligent foreigners have been struck blind by the dazzling splendor of the prudence, moderation, or integrity of those most immediately engaged in such transactions. But, sir, just fifty years have passed since this mournful prophecy was penned, and there is not one of us who does not feel and know that we stand face to face with its fulfillment. There is not one of us who does not feel that the people of this country are treading upon the thin and treacherous crust of a smoldering volcano whose first convulsive throes have already shaken this continent from its center to its circumference. Look around you, sir! Behold the appalling prostration of every variety of active enterprise. See the stagnation in all our useful industries, and the daily loss of millions to the business interests of our country; capital comparatively idle, and thousands of honest, stalwart, sturdy laborers wandering from door to door, not begging food for their starving families, but imploring leave to earn it by honest toil, to return weary and dispirited to their bleak hearth-stones, where their helpless wives and little ones are confronted by the gaunt grinning specters of misery and famine. Why is this so, sir? Why is it that the people of this country from one end of it to the other are looking to our action here with an agony of solicitude such as was never felt among mortal men before? Sir, it is because the hour which is to test the strength and try the goodness of our Constitution has come. It is because there is a deep and wide-spread apprehension, an apprehension pervading all classes everywhere, that under some mysterious species of political legerdemain the provisions of the Federal Constitution in relation to the election of President and Vice-President are to be transformed into a miserable delusive sham, a monstrous masterpiece of deception and fraud; that the choice which the American people have made of their chief executive officers by over a quarter of a million majority at the polls is liable to be defeated by the machinations of a handful of political buccaneers assisted by the authorities of the Federal Government here at the capital.

Whether that apprehension is well or ill founded I will not pause here to inquire, nor will I undertake to predict at this moment what will be the ultimate effect which any action that may be taken by this Congress in relation to the electoral votes for President and Vice-President will have upon the destinies of this country. What that may be God in His infinite wisdom only knows, as He in His infinite mercy has ordained and will direct the cause. I only know that as a member of this House, as one of the Representatives of the grandest people that ever dwelt beneath the sun, I, in common with every gentleman around me, have a high and solemn duty to perform in determining the true result of the recent presidential electon; and that if I should neglect or refuse to ascertain that duty as far as I may have the capacity, or hesitate to perform it faithfully and fearlessly as I honestly understand it, I would regard myself as a traitor and a coward, deserving the detestation and scorn of the generous and confiding constituency which sent me here.

I would, therefore, invite gentlemen to a consideration of that duty through the calm clear medium of dispassionate reason, and would in the outset ask their attention to certain premises drawn directly from the Constitution, and about which I presume there can be no possible dispute, as I will state them in the exact language of that instrument.

First. The Constitution of the United States provides that no person except a natural-born citizen, or a citizen of the United States at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, shall be eligible to the office of President of the United States; and that no person shall be eligible to that office who shall not have attained to the age of thirty-five years, and been fourteen years a resident within the United States; and that no person constitutionally ineligible to the office of President shall be eligible to that of Vice-President of the United States.

Now it is certainly possible that all, or at least a majority of all the electors appointed, might cast their votes for a person for President or Vice-President who was not a natural-born citizen, and it is by no means improbable that a majority of all the electors appointed might cast their votes for one who although a natural-born citizen had not attained to the age of thirty-five years, or who had not resided fourteen years within the United States. Yet, sir, there is not a sane man on the continent who, in view of the plain constitutional provisions I have mentioned, would pretend for a moment that a solitary one of these votes would have a particle more force or virtue than if the ballots had been cast for the man in the moon, or the Tycoon of Japan. And why? Simply because the Constitution declares such persons ineligible; that is, as utterly incapable of receiving the votes as if they had no physical existence whatever.

But again: The Constitution further provides that—

> Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors, equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress: but no Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector.

And in view of this provision it is perfectly manifest that if a number of persons within a given State, equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which such State might be entitled, should get together and assume to cast the electoral vote of that State without having been appointed electors by the State, or in the manner directed by the Legislature, or if the Legislature had totally failed to prescribe any manner of appointing electors whatever, every solitary one of such pretended votes would be as absolutely null and void as so many pieces of blank paper. And so, if a person claiming to have been appointed an elector in any given State, who at the time of his supposed appointment was a Senator or Representative in Congress or held an office of profit or trust under the United States, should assume to vote as such elector, the act and the pretended vote would be utterly null and void, simply because a person under such circumstances has no more constitutional power to cast an electoral vote for President or Vice-President than if he had never been born.

And again, sir, the Constitution provides that—

> The electors shall meet in their respective States and vote by ballot for President and Vice-President, one of whom, at least, shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves; they shall name in their ballots the person voted for as President, and in distinct ballots the person voted for as Vice-President, and they shall make distinct lists of all persons voted for as President, and of all persons voted for as Vice-President, and of the number of votes for each; which lists they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the seat of Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate.

Now, sir, supposing that the electors of a given State were all perfectly eligible at the time of their appointment, and that they were really appointed by the State in strict conformity with the manner directed by the Legislature thereof, yet that they met outside of the State, or failed to vote by ballot, or failed to designate in distinct ballots the persons voted for as President and Vice-President, or failed to make distinct lists of the persons voted for as President and Vice-President, or failed to sign or certify such lists, or to transmit them sealed, or directed them to the Speaker of the House, the Secretary of the Senate, the President of the United States, or any other officer or person than the President of the Senate, who would pretend that their votes would be valid for any purpose whatever?

It will not do, sir, to say that these provisions are merely directory. There is nothing in the Constitution of the United States anywhere which can be said to be merely directory. It would be insulting to the memory of the sages who framed that Constitution and degrading to the dignity of that instrument to suppose that they descended to prescribe mere advisory directions in unessential matters which might be obeyed or totally disregarded at pleasure, instead of laying down fixed and unvarying rules by which all persons charged with the performance of any function under the Constitution should shape their actions and regulate their conduct therein. Where the Constitution, which is the supreme law of the land, fixes the time and prescribes the mode in which a particular thing shall be done, there is no power on earth authorized to say it may be done at another time and in a different mode than those prescribed.

Now, sir, from what I have already quoted verbatim from the Constitution, it is as absolutely certain as that two and two make four that what is pretended to be or purports to be an electoral vote for President or Vice-President of the United States may be absolutely null and void for any one of three causes: First, the ineligibility or want of capacity of the person voted for to receive such vote, growing out of his nativity, his want of proper age, or his lack of residency in the United States for the requisite length of time; second, the lack of constitutional authority in the person pretending to give the vote, either because he was not appointed by the State, or because no mode for the appointment of electors had been prescribed by the Legislature of the State, or because the supposed appointment was not made in the manner directed by the Legislature of the State, or because the person assuming to vote as an elector was a Senator or Representative in Congress or held an office of trust or profit under the United States at the time of his pretended appointment; and, third, because the vote was not given at the place or in the manner or certified as prescribed by the Constitution of the United States. And if such pretended votes are void, it must follow as the irresistible logical conclusion that they cannot have the effect to elect the person for whom they may be cast, either as President or Vice-President, any more than if they had been left entirely blank.

But again, sir. The Constitution further provides that "the person having the greatest number of votes for President shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed; and if no person have such majority, then from the persons having the highest numbers not exceeding three on the list of those voted for as President, the House of Representatives shall choose immediately, by ballot, the President;" and, moreover, that "The person having the highest number of votes as Vice-President shall be the Vice-President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed; and if no person have a majority, then from the two highest numbers on the list the Senate shall choose a Vice-President."

So, sir, it is evident that there must be some competent authority somewhere to examine and verify the lists purporting to have been sent up as the electoral vote, then to decide upon the validity of each vote thereon, next to ascertain for whom each valid vote was given, and finally to enumerate arithmetically the votes constitutionally cast for each, in order to ascertain, first, who has been elected President and who Vice-President, and, second, if no one has been elected President, that the fact may be known, and the names of the three highest on the list ascertained, in order that the House may proceed at once to the election of a President as the Constitution directs, and third, if no person has been elected Vice-President, that the facts may be ascertained which will authorize and enable the Senate to perform its constitutional duty of electing a person to that office.

If these conclusions are correct, sir, (and I think there can be no question as to their logical accuracy,) it becomes a matter of vital importance to understand upon whom the Constitution has devolved these tremendous powers; for they are all involved necessarily in the power to count, as it must be determined what shall be counted before the mere act of counting can be done, and, as the authority to perform those preliminary functions preparatory to the actual enumeration of the votes is conferred upon no one else, it must be exercised by the persons by whom or under whose supervision the enumeration is made. Who are those persons?

This question, sir, has recently occupied a larger space in the public mind and has excited a greater degree of popular solicitude perhaps than any other that has ever occupied the attention of the American people, and quite naturally a variety of suggestions has been made as to its proper solution. Among the more prominent of these is the opinion, which has been so zealously advocated of late, that all of the grave and important powers I have enumerated, if, indeed, they reside anywhere, are vested in the President of the Senate; not, to be sure, in direct and positive terms, but by implication from the following words in the twelfth amendment to the Constitution:

The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted.

From this view the committee, in the resolutions under consideration, have expressed a positive and unqualified dissent, in which for one, sir, I most heartily concur. What new light arising out of existing circumstances may have developed this recently conceived opinion or what new principle hitherto unknown among the long-established and clearly defined canons of legal interpretation may be invoked to sustain it, I am totally unable to say; for certainly, sir, it is warranted neither by the language of the text, the reason, or spirit of the provision, nor the practical construction which has uniformly been given to it from the organization of the Government to the present time.

I need not call the attention of the learned gentlemen I see around me, sir, to the first, and perhaps the most familiar, of all the rules of legal construction, a rule laid down in the earliest dawn of enlightened jurisprudence, and reiterated by Coke, and Blackstone, and Vattel, and Domat, and every other judicial writer or jurist worthy of consideration who has ever had occasion to advert to the subject, the plain, undisputed rule alike of law and of common reason, that in the interpretation of any statutory provision, or any other written instrument whatever, recourse must be had in the first instance to the words which have been employed, and that those words must be taken in their plain, ordinary, and most obvious sense, unless there is something lurking in the context which absolutely forbids it. Nor need I insist, sir, that, of all the written instruments with which the American statesman has any concern whatever, this rule should apply with the greatest force in the interpretation of the Constitution of the United States, emanating as it did from the sublimest galaxy of intellectual greatness that ever shed its effulgence upon the annals of mankind, and reflecting the associated wisdom of the grandest assemblage of patriotic statesmen that ever met upon the earth; men of thought, men of culture, men who understood thoroughly the use and force of language, men engaged in laying down great fundamental rules intended to define the duties and limit the powers of a mighty Government, in all its departments, through all the cycles of coming time. Here, sir, if anywhere in written language, we should expect to find precision of thought and accuracy of expression.

What then is the plain, natural, common-sense import of this language, "The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted?" It certainly does declare in express terms that the President of the Senate shall open the certificates, and open all of them, and that he shall open them in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives; but does it say in so many words that he shall count the votes even if nothing more were implied in the word "count" than merely to enumerate those upon each list and declare the sum? No one will pretend that it does. Then, if the framers of the Constitution had intended that he should count them, why did they not say so? They could have done so, and that in terms so plain that the simplest child could have understood it. Had it been the intention of the framers of the Constitution that the President should not only open the certificates but count the votes in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, they could have expressed that intention with equal elegance, by a very slight alteration in the arrangement of the identical words they did employ, and that too so clearly that "the wayfaring man, though a fool, shall not err therein." They could and would have said, "The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and then count the votes." And had they done so there could have been no earthly doubt as to what they meant. But, sir, they did not choose to do so; and the irresistible conclusion must be that they did not intend to confer upon the President of the Senate any such tremendous powers as have recently been and are still being claimed for him, unless there is something in the context clearly indicating that intent or unless some such overpowering reason can be found in the very purpose and spirit of the provision as will show that such power belongs to him by inevitable implication.

Now, sir, examine the context with a microscope if you will, and you will find nothing which confers any more power upon the President of the Senate to count the electoral vote than upon the Sergeant-at-Arms or the Doorkeeper. The whole thing is embraced in the single sentence I have quoted. Let us see therefore if there is anything in the reason or spirit of the provision which can have the effect to give him that power.

That there was a manifest propriety, a sound and sufficient reason, for the requirement that the lists of electoral votes should be transmitted to the President of the Senate in preference to any one else no one can deny, because in the first place it was necessary that some one person should be the repository of the lists that should come up from the several States, from the time they should respectively reach the seat of Government until they should be opened; and his high position would be the best guarantee of their safe-keeping and security from alteration until that time; and, secondly, because his attitude as presiding officer of the Senate naturally suggested him as the proper person to lay them before the Senate and House when they should meet to see them opened, and that it would be eminently proper that in discharging that duty he should know that he was opening the identical certificates sent up, which he could not know unless he had received them and kept them all the time in his own possession. There was an obvious propriety too in his being required to open all the certificates, for, however exalted might be his official position, he might, in case of two or more returns being sent up from the same State, be influenced by partisan zeal or tempted by personal ambition to withhold the very certificate which contained the true vote of the State. It was quite proper also that he should be required to open them in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, provided those bodies were to have any control over them or any function to perform in respect to them after they were opened; but such a requirement was certainly a vain and unnecessary thing if it was intended that they should sit idly by like a gang of poor retainers at a rich man's feast while the President of the Senate should count the electoral votes according to his sovereign will and pleasure. But, sir, while abundant reasons can be assigned for all these provisions, can any one say why the President of the Senate of all others should count the electoral votes for President and Vice-President and declare who has been elected to either of those high offices? Is there anything, either in his official position or the general nature of his functions, that would point him out as peculiarly fitted for the discharge of that high duty to the exclusion of all other persons whatever? On the contrary, sir, permit me to inquire if there are not grave reasons why this duty should not be committed to any one man, and especially to the very man who, as our past history shows, may of all others have the deepest and most direct interest in the result of the count?

I have not the time, sir, even if I had the inclination, to enter into an examination of the precedents with the view of showing that this novel doctrine that the President of the Senate has the power to count the electoral votes and declare the result is directly at variance with the settled practice of the Government, but I may be permitted to say, what nobody will deny, that it is utterly at war with the construction which the Republican party themselves put upon this very provision of the Constitution twelve years ago, when they had absolute control of every department of the Government, including both Houses of Congress, and which they continued to practice as well as preach so long as they rode upon the flood-tide of success. Why the twenty-second joint rule is not just as fair and just as constitutional now as it was twelve years ago, or eight years ago, or even four years ago, and why there has been such a radical revolution in the opinion of certain republican leaders as to the constitutional mode of procedure in such cases, I confess I do not know.

Perhaps they can give some good reason for their wonderful exhibition of political gymnastics. I don't know. Perhaps they may only say, as the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRIS] said yesterday:

> The devil was sick, the devil a monk would be;
> The devil was well, the devil a monk was he.

In view, therefore, Mr. Speaker, of the plain language of the Constitution and of the absolute certainty that no reasonable or necessary implications can be deduced from that language by which it can be claimed that the President of the Senate has any other authority in respect of the electoral votes, except such as is therein expressly conferred upon him, it seems to me that the inevitable, irresistible, logical conclusion from the premises is aptly expressed in the language of the resolutions reported by the committee, that the sole power devolved by the Constitution of the United States upon the President of the Senate in respect to the electoral votes for President and Vice-President of the United States is to receive the sealed lists of votes which may be transmitted to him, keep them safely, and open all the certificates in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives. There, sir, his functions cease. Whatever he might do beyond that would be a bold usurpation of authority and a plain violation of the Constitution. But, Mr. Speaker, the committee have laid down another proposition in the resolutions under consideration which is, in my judgment, utterly irrefragable; and that is that the power to count the electoral votes is conferred by the Constitution upon the Senate and House of Representatives. I admit that this power is not expressed in so many words; but, sir, it arises by a necessary and irresistible implication out of a power which is conferred and is an indispensable incident to certain duties which are enjoined upon them respectively by the expressed words of the Constitution.

Now, let us recur to the language of the twelfth amendment and see if this is not so. It provides that—

> The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted; the person having the greatest number of votes for President shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed; and if no person have such majority, then from the persons having the highest numbers not exceeding three on the list of those voted for as President, the House of Representatives shall choose immediately, by ballot, the President. * * * The person having the greatest number of votes for Vice-President shall be the Vice-President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed; and if no person have a majority, then from the two highest numbers on the list the Senate shall choose the Vice-President.

Now, sir, it will not be denied that the clauses I have just read expressly enjoin upon the Senate and House of Representatives respectively the duty of electing a President or Vice-President in the event that no person has received a majority of all the electors appointed, and limit the choice to three particular persons in the one case and to two in the other. When the contingency occurs the House, upon whom the duty devolves, must proceed to make the choice. But all will admit that somebody must determine when that contingency has happened, and as no other power is designated in the Constitution to judge for them they must necessarily judge for themselves when it has occurred. In order to come to a judgement, however, as to whether the contingency has arisen, they must necessarily determine a variety of preliminary questions. That is, in order to know whether any one candidate has received a majority of the whole number of electors appointed, they must first ascertain how many have been appointed; but whether any or all of those purporting to be electors have been appointed or not depends upon several other questions: first, whether they were eligible or capable of being appointed at the time of their alleged appointment; second, whether the State Legislature had directed the manner in which the appointment should be made; and, third, whether they have been actually appointed in the manner directed by the Legislature. All these questions, in the absence of any other authority to determine them, must be determined by the Senate and House of Representatives themselves in order to arrive at the whole number of electors appointed. Having determined that fact, the next step must be to ascertain whether any candidate has received a majority of that number. That would depend, first, upon whether the person appearing to have received the votes of a majority of all the legally appointed electors was eligible or capable of receiving them or not; as whether he was a natural-born citizen, or had attained to the age of thirty-five years, or had been fourteen years a resident within the United States; second, whether the votes appearing to have been cast by legally appointed and competent electors for the person appearing to have received a majority were actually cast, and the lists thereof made out, signed, and certified within the State at the time and in the manner prescribed by the Constitution of the United States and the laws made in pursuance thereof; and these questions they must in like manner determine for themselves, as no one else has been designated in the Constitution to do it for them. In a word, sir, the power to elect in the contingency provided for carries with it by a necessary and unavoidable implication the power to judge and determine what votes are valid and legally cast, and to count such as may be so adjudged, in order to ascertain and determine whether the power of election can be constitutionally exercised.

I will not now undertake to discuss the particular mode in which the two Houses should exercise their power of counting the electoral votes or the method in which they should discharge the duties incident thereto; but, sir, in whatever manner they may choose to do so the House of Representatives is at least the equal of the Senate; equal in power, equal in dignity, and equally entitled to the consideration of the several departments of the Government and of the people, and in no event can anything be counted as an electoral vote for President contrary to its deliberately expressed judgment. "What, sir," you may say, "can the House reject the vote of a sovereign State? Impossible! It would be revolutionary!" Certainly, sir, it would be revolutionary for the House or for the House and Senate combined to reject the vote of a sovereign State, and whoever would consent to such a proposition ought to be scourged through the world at a cart's-tail, with the evidence of his infamy branded upon his forehead, an object of loathing and contempt and scorn to all honest men everywhere. Sir, I can conceive of but one other character who would more justly deserve the universal execration of mankind, and that is the man who would consent to the perpetration of such a shameless outrage upon a sovereign State as the counting of an illegal, invalid, forged, or fraudulent ballot as the electoral vote of that State, no matter by whom fabricated or by what criminal device it may have been placed among the genuine votes of the States. No, sir, no power on earth can legally reject any valid electoral vote. It would be worse than treason to do so, but it would be equally criminal to count as an electoral vote a fraudulent or void thing. Mark you, sir, it is votes that the States must send here—genuine, valid votes! If we ask them for bread, shall they give us a stone? If the Constitution asks of the State of Louisiana eight fishes, shall Mr. Kellogg send eight rattlesnakes to sting it to death?

But, sir, it may be asked if Congress or either House in determining these questions can possibly go behind the "great seal" of a State. When our eyes once rest upon the talismanic impression of that potential instrument, are we not at once as powerless as if we had looked upon the head of Medusa or been stricken by the blasting glance of the basilisk? It may sometimes be a difficult and arduous undertaking, sir, to get behind a great seal; as much so, perhaps, as it was formerly to double the Cape of Good Hope; but, if gentlemen will examine the Constitution of the United States and the proceedings of the convention by which it was framed, I apprehend they will find but little difficulty in getting at a fraudulent or invalid electoral vote, even though it may be concealed behind a "great seal." If they will examine the proceedings of the convention they will find that it was moved and seconded to insert after the word "transmit" the words "under the seal of the State;" so the clause would read: "And they shall make a list of all the persons voted for and of the number of votes for each; which list they shall sign and certify and transmit under the seal of the State to the seat of Government, directed to the President of the Senate;" which motion to insert, it seems, was negatived without a call of the yeas and nays. No, Mr. Speaker, "the fathers," as they are now reverently and affectionately styled whenever an outrage is about to be perpetrated against the Constitution which they have given us, may have labored under the delusion that "No man worthy of the office of President would be willing to hold it if counted or placed there by fraud" and they may have believed that the devil could cite Scripture for his purpose, but they were not so deeply skilled in the art and mystery of counting votes as to fully understand how valuable the Army and Navy might be as auxiliary in the performance of that difficult feat now familiarly known as "a fair count." Had they been thoroughly enlightened on that point, sir, they would undoubtedly have made provision for stripping the frontiers and crowding the capital with soldiers whenever the electoral vote for President and Vice-President should be counted. The Constitution would never have left their hands, sir, without a provision that the President of the United States should see to it that on every such occasion not less than thirteen batteries of artillery should be placed within easy cannon-shot of the Senate and House of Representatives. Ignorant and unsuspecting as they were, it never even occurred to them that the picture of a nest of pelicans or any other outrage upon the fine arts should be more potent as an instrument of evidence than the testimony of a thousand living witnesses. Consequently you will find, sir, upon consulting the Constitution that the only rule which they prescribed for authenticating the electoral vote of any State was that the electors should sign and certify the lists of votes which they should transmit sealed to the seat of Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate, leaving it to the Senate and House of Representatives, upon whom the duty of counting the votes should devolve, to enlighten their own consciences, and inform their own judgments as to their validity by such legal means of proof as to them should seem expedient and satisfactory under the circumstances. Supposing that the Senate and House of Representatives would discharge the grave duties committed to them honestly, fairly, and in conformity to the obligation of the oaths they had taken, they deemed it best to circumscribe their action by no inflexible rules as to the nature and extent of the evidence by which they should be governed.

It is true, sir, that by an act of Congress passed in 1792 it was attempted to be made the duty of the executive of each State to cause three lists of the names of the electors of such State to be made and certified and delivered to the electors, on or before the day on which they are required to meet and cast their votes; yet a very little reflection is sufficient to show that that provision is utterly nugatory; for, even if it be admitted that Congress can by law impose any duty on the governor of a State, or whether it can or not, it will certainly not be contended that this Congress can by a mere statute circumscribe or impair the constitutional powers of any Congress which may come after it.

Now, sir, a few words in relation to the second resolution offered by the minority of the committee, and I will have done. That resolution is in the following words:

Resolved, Second, That in the absence of legislative provision on the subject, or authoritative direction from the Senate and House of Representatives, the President of the Senate upon opening the certificates declares and counts the electoral votes for President and Vice President of the United States.

This, in effect, if not in terms, declares that the President of the Senate is invested with power and authority not only to open the certificates, but to decide what are and what are not the votes to be counted; to reject what in his judgment may be invalid, enumerate the balance, and declare the result; but that he may be divested of that authority by act of Congress, or perhaps a joint rule or concurrent resolution of the two Houses.

Now, if he is really invested with this tremendous power, he must derive it directly or by unavoidable implication from the Constitution of the United States. If he does derive it from the Constitution, either expressly or impliedly, it is his right to exercise it in defiance of any act of Congress that may be passed; and Congress has no more constitutional authority to strip him of it than they have to take the command of the Army and Navy from the President or to regulate the descent of the crown of Russia. If they have, then Congress by virtue of that same authority may strip every department of the last vestige of its constitutional power and totally subvert and revolutionize the Government by a simple statutory enactment. If gentlemen can defend such a doctrine in the face of the country, I congratulate myself and the rest of the American people that they now have the opportunity to do so, for, if the two Houses of Congress are thus absolute, it is high time we should know it. And there is another thing which I would like for the gentlemen to explain in support of this resolution. They will agree with me that no power can be implied from the Constitution except in aid of some power which has been expressly granted. We all admit, too, that the power to open the certificates in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives is expressly granted by the Constitution to the President of the Senate. Now, what I wish to have explained is this: How can the power to count the votes aid the President of the Senate in the execution of his power to open the certificates? When these difficulties are cleared out of the way it will be time enough to consider the propriety of assenting to the propositions embraced in the resolution.

I am conscious, sir, that in the limited time I have had I have been merely able to touch the surface of the grave questions presented for the consideration of the American Congress in relation to the election of President and Vice-President. Other gentlemen will doubtless explore them more thoroughly. Thanking the House, therefore for the courteous attention it has given me. I have simply to add that, in my judgment, any attempt on the part of any man or body of men, whether executive, legislative, or ministerial, to coerce this House to count or consent to the count of a thing as an electoral vote which, in its judgment, is false, or fraudulent, or void, or to throw out of the count any which in its judgment is genuine and valid, to any wise interfere with the peaceful and orderly exercise of any of its functions in relation to the electoral votes, in accordance with its own judgment, would be totally subversive of our constitutional government, and, if accompanied by armed and organized force, that such attempt would be treason.

Before Mr. KNOTT had concluded his speech his hour expired.

Mr. FRYE. I ask that by unanimous consent the time of the gentleman from Kentucky be extended.

There was no objection, and Mr. KNOTT'S time having been extended indefinitely, he resumed, and concluded his remarks, as printed above.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 3741) amending the act incorporating the proprietors of Glenwood Cemetery, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, agreed to the conference asked for by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. INGALLS, and Mr. COCKRELL as conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House was requested, bills of the House of the following titles:

The bill (H. R. No. 231) for the relief of Robert Erwin; and

The bill (H. R. No. 859) for the benefit of Andrew Williams, of Weakley County, Tennessee.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. No. 1850) granting a pension to Harvey B. Kilbourn, private in Company C, Thirtieth Regiment Pennsylvania Militia.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. No. 948) for the relief of Thomas M. Simmons;

A bill (S. No. 920) to authorize Louis Petoskey, of Michigan, to enter a certain tract of land which embraces his house and improvements;

A bill (S. No. 734) for the relief of William Jasper Cordell;

A bill (S. No. 286) for the relief of W. S. McComb, of the State of Georgia; and

A bill (S. No. 36) amending the pension law so as to remove the disability of those who, having participated in the rebellion, have, since its termination, enlisted in the Army of the United States and become disabled.

COUNTING THE ELECTORAL VOTE.

Mr. KNOTT. I ask that the motion to reconsider the vote recommitting these resolutions be sustained, in order that my friend the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] may have an opportunity to present his resolutions on the part of the minority in a regular manner.

The question being put, the motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. KNOTT. I now withdraw the motion to recommit.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. On behalf of the minority of the committee I offer as a substitute for the resolutions reported by the majority of the committee the resolutions which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, First, That it is the power and duty of the House, conjointly with the Senate, to provide by law or other constitutional method a mode for fairly and truly ascertaining and properly counting the electoral vote of each State, so as to give effect to the choice of each State in the election of President and Vice-President.

Resolved, Second, That in the absence of legislative provision on the subject or authoritative direction from the Senate and House of Representatives, the President of the Senate, upon opening the certificates, declares and counts the electoral votes for President and Vice-President of the United States.

Mr. PAYNE. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to yield to me that I may make a privileged report.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. PAYNE. I am instructed by the select committee appointed to act in conjunction with a similar committee of the Senate to prepare and report "a proper mode of counting the electoral votes for President and Vice-President, and of determining questions that may arise as to the legality and validity of returns made of such votes by the several States," to submit a joint report of the Senate and House committees; and also a bill, which I will ask the Clerk to read.

It will be observed that the report is signed by every member of the House committee and by six of the seven members of the Senate committee.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The committees of the Senate and House of Representatives appointed under the following several resolutions—

HOUSE RESOLUTION.

"Whereas there are differences of opinion as to the proper mode of counting the electoral votes for President and Vice-President, and as to the manner of determining questions that may arise as to the legality and validity of returns made of such votes by the several States;

"And whereas it is of the utmost importance that all differences of opinion and all doubt and uncertainty upon these questions should be removed, to the end therefore that the votes may be counted and the result declared by a tribunal whose authority none can question and whose decision all will accept as final: Therefore,

"Resolved, That a committee of seven members of this House be appointed by the Speaker, to act in conjunction with any similar committee that may be appointed by the Senate, to prepare and report without delay such a measure, either legislative or constitutional, as may, in their judgment, be best calculated to accomplish the desired end, and that said committee have leave to report at any time."

SENATE RESOLUTION.

"Resolved, That the message of the House of Representatives on the subject of the presidential election be referred to a select committee of seven Senators, with power to prepare and report, without unnecessary delay, such a measure, either of a legislative or other character, as may, in their judgment, be best calculated to accomplish the lawful counting of the electoral votes, and best disposition of all questions connected therewith, and the due declaration of the result; and that said committee have power to confer and act with the committee of the House of Representatives named in said message, and to report by bill or otherwise"— beg leave to report to their respective Houses that they have considered the subject named in said resolutions, and have had full and free conference with each other thereon, and now report the accompanying bill and recommend its passage. The substance of the bill embraces—

First. Provisions for the meeting of the two Houses, as required by the Constitution, and the general course of proceeding, and the declaration of the result.

Second. Provisions for the disposition of questions arising in respect of States from which only one set of certificates has been received; that each House shall consider the question and shall only decide against a vote by concurrent, affirmative action.

Third. Provisions for so-called double returns from a State; that such conflicting returns and papers shall be submitted to the consideration of a commission, composed of equal numbers of members of the Senate and of the House of Representatives and of the Supreme Court of the United States; that this commission shall be organized and sworn and have power to consider and decide, according to the Constitution and law, what is the constitutional vote of the State in question; and that such decision shall govern the disposition of the subject, unless both Houses shall determine otherwise.

Fourth. It is provided that the act shall not affect either way the question of the right of resort to the judicial courts of the United States by the persons concerned as claimants to the offices in question.

We have applied the utmost practicable study and deliberation to the subject, and believe that the bill now reported is the best attainable disposition of the difficult problems and disputed theories arising out of the late election. It must be obvious to every person conversant with the history of the country and with the formation and interpretation of the Constitution that a wide diversity of views and opinions touching the subject, not wholly coincident with the bias or wishes of the members of political parties, would naturally exist. We have in this state of things chosen, therefore, not to deal with abstract questions, save so far as they are necessarily involved in the legislation proposed. It is, of course, plain that the report of the bill implies that in our opinion legislation may be had on the subject in accordance with the Constitution, but we think that the law proposed is inconsistent with few of the principal theories upon the subject. The Constitution requires that the electoral votes shall be counted on a particular occasion. All will agree that the votes named in the Constitution are the constitutional votes of the States, and not other; and when they have been found and identified, there is nothing left to be disputed or decided; all the rest is the mere clerical work of summing up the numbers, which being done, the Constitution itself declares the consequence.

This bill, then, is only directed to ascertaining, for the purpose and in aid of the counting, what are the constitutional votes of the respective States; and, whatever jurisdiction exists for such purpose, the bill only regulates the method of exercising it. The Constitution, our great instrument and security for liberty and order, speaks in the amplest language for all such cases, in whatever aspect they may be presented. It declares that the Congress shall have power "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States or in any department or officer thereof." The committee therefore think that the law proposed cannot be justly assailed as unconstitutional by any one, and for this reason we think it unnecessary, whatever may be our individual views, to discuss any of the theories referred to. Our fidelity to the Constitution is observed when we find that the law we recommend is consistent with that instrument.

The matter then being a proper subject for legislation, the fitness of the means proposed becomes the next subject for consideration. Upon this we beg leave to submit a few brief observations.

In all just governments both public and private rights must be defined and determined by the law. This is essential to the very idea of such a government, and is the characteristic distinction between free and despotic systems. However important it may be, whether one citizen or another shall be the Chief Magistrate for a prescribed period, upon just theories of civil institutions, it is of far greater moment that the will of the people, lawfully expressed in the choice of that officer, shall be ascertained and carried into effect in a lawful way. It is true that in every operation of a government of laws, from the most trivial to the most important, there will always be the possibility that the result reached will not be the true one. The executive officer may not wisely perform his duty, the courts may not truly declare the law, and the legislative body may not enact the best laws; but, in either case, to resist the act of the Executive, the courts, or the Legislature, acting constitutionally and lawfully within their sphere, would be to set up anarchy in the place of government. We think, then, that to provide a clear and lawful means of performing a great and necessary function of government, in a time of much public dispute, is of far greater importance than the particular advantage that any man or party may in the course of events possibly obtain. But we have still endeavored to provide such lawful agencies of decision in the present case as shall be the most fair and impartial possible under the circumstances. Each of the branches of the Legislature and the judiciary is represented in the tribunal in equal proportions. The composition of the judicial part of the commission looks to a selection from different parts of the Republic, while it is thought to be free from any preponderance of supposable bias; and the addition of the necessary constituent part of the whole commission, in order to obtain an uneven number, is left to an agency the farthest removed from prejudice of any existing attainable one. It would be difficult, if not impossible, we think, to establish a tribunal that could be less the subject of party criticism than such a one. The principle of its constitution is so absolutely fair that we are unable to perceive how the most extreme partisan can assail it, unless he prefers to embark his wishes upon the stormy sea of unregulated procedure, hot disputes, and dangerous results, that can neither be measured nor defined, rather than upon the fixed and regular course of law, that insures peace and the order of society, whatever party may be disappointed in its hopes.

The unfortunate circumstance that no provision had been made on the subject before the election has greatly added to the difficulties of the committees in dealing with it, inasmuch as many of the people of the country, members of the respective political parties, will perhaps look with jealousy upon any measure that seems to involve even the possibility of the defeat of their wishes; but it has also led the committees to feel that their members are bound by the highest duty, in such a case, to let no bias of party feeling stand in the way of a just, equal, and peaceful measure for extricating the question from the embarrassments that at present surround it.

In conclusion, we respectfully beg leave to impress upon Congress the necessity of a speedy determination upon this subject. It is impossible to estimate the material loss that the country daily sustains from the existing state of uncertainty. It directly and powerfully tends to unsettle and paralyze business, to weaken public and private credit, and to create apprehensions in the minds of the people that disturb the peaceful tenor of their ways and mar their happiness. It does far more: it tends to bring republican institutions into discredit, and to create doubts of the success of our form of government, and of the perpetuity of the Republic. All considerations of interest, of patriotism, and of justice unite in demanding of the law-making power a measure that will bring peace and prosperity to the country, and show that our republican institutions are equal to any emergency. And in this connection we cannot refrain from the expression of our satisfaction that your committees, composed of equal numbers of opposing parties, have fortunately been able to do what has been attempted in vain heretofore, almost unanimously agree upon a plan considered by them all to be just, wise, and efficient. We accordingly recommend the proposed act to the patriotic and just judgment of Congress.

The bill reported by the committee (H. R. No. 4454) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877, was received and read a first and second time.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Senate and House of Representatives shall meet in the Hall of the House of Representatives at the hour of one o'clock p. m., on the first Thursday in February, A. D. 1877; and the President of the Senate shall be their presiding officer. Two tellers shall be previously appointed on the part of the Senate, and two on the part of the House of Representatives, to whom shall be handed, as they are opened by the President of the Senate, all the certificates, and papers purporting to be certificates, of the electoral votes, which certificates and papers shall be opened, presented, and acted upon in the alphabetical order of the States, beginning with the letter A; and said tellers having then read the same in the presence and hearing of the two Houses, shall make a list of the votes as they shall appear from the said certificates; and the votes having been ascertained and counted as in this act provided, the result of the same shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall thereupon announce the state of the vote, and the names of the persons, if any, elected, which announcement shall be deemed a sufficient declaration of the persons elected President and Vice-President of the United States, and, together with a list of the votes, be entered on the Journals of the two Houses. Upon such reading of any such certificate or paper when there shall be only one return from a State, the President of the Senate shall call for objections, if any. Every objection shall be made in writing, and shall state clearly and concisely, and without argument, the ground thereof, and shall be signed by at least one Senator and one member of the House of Representatives before the same shall be received. When all objections so made to any vote or paper from a State shall have been received and read, the Senate shall thereupon withdraw, and such objections shall be submitted to the Senate for its decision; and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall, in like manner, submit such objections to the House of Representatives for its decision; and no electoral vote or votes from any State from which but one return has been received shall be rejected except by the affirmative vote of the two Houses. When the two Houses have voted, they shall immediately again meet, and the presiding officer shall then announce the decision of the question submitted.

SEC. 2. That if more than one return, or paper purporting to be a return from a State, shall have been received by the President of the Senate, purporting to be the certificates of electoral votes given at the last preceding election for President and Vice-President in such State, (unless they shall be duplicates of the same return,) all such returns and papers shall be opened by him in the presence of the two Houses when act as aforesaid, and read by the tellers, and all such returns and papers shall thereupon be submitted to the judgment and decision as to which is the true and lawful electoral vote of such State, of a commission constituted as follows, namely:

During the session of each House on the Tuesday next preceding the first Thursday in February, 1877, each House shall, by viva voce vote, appoint five of its members, who with the five associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, to be ascertained as hereinafter provided, shall constitute a commission for the decision of all questions upon or in respect of such double returns named in this section.

On the Tuesday preceding the first Thursday in February, A. D. 1877, or as soon thereafter as may be, the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States now assigned to the first, third, eighth, and ninth circuits shall select, in such manner as a majority of them shall deem fit, another of the associate justices of said court, which five persons shall be members of said commission; and the person longest in commission of said five justices shall be the presi'ent of said commission. The members of said commission shall respectively take and subscribe the following oath:

"I, ——— ———, do solemnly swear (or affirm, as the case may be,) that I will impartially examine and consider all questions submitted to the commission of which I am a member, and a true judgment give thereon, agreeably to the Constitution and the laws: so help me God;" which oath shall be filed with the Secretary of the Senate.

When the commission shall have been thus organized, it shall not be in the power of either House to dissolve the same, or to withdraw any of its members; but if any such Senator or Member shall die or become physically unable to perform the duties required by this act, the fact of such death or physical inability shall be by said commission, before it shall proceed further, communicated to the Senate or House of Representatives, as the case may be, which body shall immediately and without debate proceed by viva voce vote to fill the place so vacated, and the person so appointed shall take and subscribe the oath hereinbefore prescribed, and become a member of said commission; and, in like manner, if any of said justices of the Supreme Court shall die or become physically incapable of performing the duties required by this act, the other of said justices, members of the said commission, shall immediately appoint another justice of said court a member of said commission, and, in such appointments, regard shall be had to the impartiality and freedom from bias sought by the original appointments to said commission, who shall thereupon immediately take and subscribe the oath hereinbefore prescribed, and become a member of said commission to fill the vacancy so occasioned.

All the certificates and papers purporting to be certificates of the electoral votes of each State shall be opened, in the alphabetical order of the States, as provided in section 1 of this act; and when there shall be more than one such certificate or paper, as the certificates and papers from such State shall so be opened, (excepting duplicates of the same return,) they shall be read by the tellers, and thereupon the President of the Senate shall call for objections, if any. Every objection shall be made in writing, and shall state clearly and concisely, and without argument, the ground thereof, and shall be signed by at least one Senator and one member of the House of Representatives before the same shall be received. When all such objections so made to any certificate, vote, or paper from a State shall have been received and read, all such certificates, votes, and papers so objected to, and all papers accompanying the same, together with such objections, shall be forthwith submitted to said commission, which shall proceed to consider the same, with the same powers, if any, now possessed for that purpose by the two Houses acting separately or together, and, by a majority of votes, decide whether any and what votes from such State are the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States, and how many and what persons were duly appointed electors in such State, and may therein take into view such petitions, depositions, and other papers, if any, as shall, by the Constitution and now existing law, be competent and pertinent in such consideration; which decision shall be made in writing, stating briefly the ground thereof, and signed by the members of said commission agreeing therein; whereupon the two Houses shall again meet, and such decision shall be read and entered in the Journal of each House, and the counting of the votes shall proceed in conformity therewith, unless, upon objection made thereto in writing by at least five Senators and five members of the House of Representatives, the two Houses shall separately concur in ordering otherwise, in which case such concurrent order shall govern. No votes or papers from any other State shall be acted upon until the objections previously made to the votes or papers from any State shall have been finally disposed of.

SEC. 3. That while the two Houses shall be in meeting, as provided in this act, no debate shall be allowed and no question shall be put by the presiding officer, except to either House on a motion to withdraw; and he shall have power to preserve order.

SEC. 4. That when the two Houses separate to decide upon an objection that may have been made to the counting of any electoral vote or votes from any State, or upon objection to a report of said commission, or other question arising under this act, each Senator and Representative may speak to such objection or question ten minutes, and not oftener than once; but after such debate shall have lasted two hours, it shall be the duty of each House to put the main question without further debate.

SEC. 5. That at such joint meeting of the two Houses seats shall be provided as follows: For the President of the Senate, the Speaker's chair; for the Speaker, immediately upon his left; the Senators in the body of the Hall upon the right of the presiding officer; for the Representatives, in the body of the Hall not provided for the Senators; for the tellers, Secretary of the Senate, and Clerk of the House of Representatives, at the Clerk's desk; for the other officers of the two Houses, in front of the Clerk's desk and upon each side of the Speaker's platform. Such joint meeting shall not be dissolved until the count of electoral votes shall be completed and the result declared; and no recess shall be taken unless a question shall have arisen in regard to counting any such votes, or otherwise under this act, in which case it shall be competent for either House, acting separately, in the manner hereinbefore provided, to direct a recess of such House not beyond the next day, Sunday excepted, at the hour of ten o'clock in the forenoon. And while any question is being considered by said commission, either House may proceed with its legislative or other business.

SEC. 6. That nothing in this act shall be held to impair or affect any right now existing under the Constitution and laws to question, by proceeding in the judicial courts of the United States, the right or title of the person who shall be declared elected, or who shall claim to be President or Vice-President of the United States, if any such right exists.

SEC. 7. That said commission shall make its own rules, keep a record of its proceedings, and shall have power to employ such persons as may be necessary for the transaction of its business and the execution of its powers.

Mr. PAYNE. I move that the bill be printed and recommitted.

I desire to call the attention of the House to one feature of this bill. It changes the time of the joint convention to count the electoral vote, making it two weeks earlier than under the present law. The present law provides that the joint meeting of the two Houses shall be on the second Wednesday of February. In order to give more time to the tribunal to pass upon the questions that may be submitted to it, the committee have changed that time to the 1st day of February, two weeks from to-day. In order, therefore, that the bill may pass both Houses and go to the President in time, it is necessary that it should be brought very early to the attention of the House. Without making a motion at this time, I desire to say on behalf of the committee that I will hereafter submit a motion to make the bill a special order for consideration on an early day.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that if the motion to print and recommit should prevail the same privilege would still attach to the committee to call up their report at any time.

Mr. PAYNE. I move the previous question on the recommittal of the bill.

Mr. THORNBURGH. I desire to make a suggestion to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. PAYNE. I would remind the gentleman that I only hold the floor by the courtesy of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BURCHARD.]

Mr. THORNBURGH. I merely wish to suggest that the ordinary number of copies would not be sufficient. If the House would give unanimous consent——

Mr. HOAR. That can be done afterward.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the motion was agreed to, and the bill was ordered to be printed and recommitted.

Mr. PAYNE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was recommitted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. PAYNE. I now ask unanimous consent that I may make a motion to print an additional number of copies of the report and bill.

There was no objection.

Mr. PAYNE. I move that five thousand extra copies be printed.
The motion was agreed to.

COMMITTEE OF CONFERENCE.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of the following as the conferees on the part of the House in the conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon House bill No. 3628, to establish certain post-roads; Mr. CLARK of Missouri, Mr. AINSWORTH, and Mr. MILLER.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 940) for the relief of Edwin Ebert;
An act (H. R. No. 1521) granting a pension to Louis A. McLaughlin;
An act (H. R. No. 2242) granting a pension to George McColly;
An act (H. R. No. 2287) for the relief of Peters & Reed, naval contractors at Norfolk navy-yard in the year 1860;
An act (H. R. No. 3653) making appropriation for the improvement and repair of the military road between Springfield and Fort Randall in the Territory of Dakota;
An act (H. R. No. 2842) granting a pension to Robert S. Toland; and
An act (H. R. No. 3500) granting a pension to Nelson Ainslie.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate insisted upon its amendments disagreed to by the House, and disagreed to the amendment of the House to Senate amendment No. 12 to the bill (H. R. No. 4307) making appropriations to supply certain deficiencies in the contingent fund of the House of Representatives, and requested a conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed as the conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. WINDOM, Mr. ALLISON, and Mr. WITHERS.

COUNTING THE ELECTORAL VOTE.

The House resumed the consideration of the report of the special committee on the rights and privileges of the House in relation to the counting the electoral vote.

The SPEAKER. Upon this subject the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. COOK. If the gentleman will yield, I will submit a motion that the House now adjourn.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. Will this subject come up to-morrow as unfinished business, in case the House shall now adjourn?

The SPEAKER. It will.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. Then, if it be the desire of the House, I will yield for that motion.

Mr. KASSON. If the gentlemen do not wish to go on with the discussion of this subject, then I would ask unanimous consent that it be laid aside, so that we can have a morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The difficulty in the consideration of any business at this time is the confusion now prevailing in the Hall. The Chair will direct the officers of the House to assist in preserving order. [After a pause.] The gentleman from Illinois is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I agree with the sentiment expressed by the chairman of the select committee [Mr. KNOTT] at the opening of his remarks. A grave and important duty devolves upon the House of Representatives in regard to the counting of the electoral votes. It is now by the resolutions of the majority brought to the consideration of its constitutional powers and the denial of the powers of others in ascertaining the result of the election for President and Vice-President of the United States. The resolutions of the majority assert for the House an almost unlimited power in the disposition of the questions that may arise upon the reception or count of the electoral votes forwarded to the President of the Senate.

The gentleman from Kentucky in his able argument insists that, as the Constitution disqualifies certain persons from being electors, therefore the power is not only vested in Congress to legislate upon the subject, but, as the resolutions which he sustains unqualifiedly assert, the power is vested in the House to decide upon the qualifications of the electors, and also to examine whether a State has properly exercised its functions and duties in the appointment of its electors, and reject any vote the House sees fit. That involves the great constitutional question whether the Congress, whether the Federal Government, has the right to review the proceedings of a State in the election or appointment of any of its officers.

The gentleman claims that, because the Constitution provides in the article relating to the qualifications of electors who shall not be appointed electors, therefore this House of Congress can reject the votes of any electors it may deem to be disqualified. If that be true, then the same must be true of other clauses of the Constitution which impose limitations upon the right of a citizen of a State to exercise a State office.

Article 6 provides that Senators and Representatives in Congress, and all executive and judicial officers, both of the United States and of the several States, shall be bound by oath or affirmation to support the Constitution of the United States. That would give the right to Congress, according to the argument of the gentleman, whenever the acts of an officer of a State are presented here before the House, to inquire into the collateral question whether or not that officer was disqualified by reason of not having taken the oath so prescribed.

Article 14 of the amendments to the Constitution provides, among other things, that no person shall hold an office in a State who, having previously taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection. The doctrine of the gentleman is that you can question collaterally the authority of an officer of a State to perform the functions and duties imposed upon him by virtue of the constitution and laws of the State. Now, I deny that to be the law. I hold that under the provisions of the Constitution itself you are bound to accept the acts of the duly-constituted authorities of the State when they are verified as required by the laws of the United States and of the State.

It seems to me that such a position would render futile section 1 of article 4 of the Constitution, which provides that "full faith and credit shall be given in each State to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other State. And the Congress may by general laws prescribe the manner in which such acts, records, and proceedings shall be approved, and the effect thereof."

Congress has made that general law in regard to the verification of the acts of States and of the officers of the States under State authority. By the law of 1792 Congress has provided the manner in which the act of a State in the appointment of electors shall be verified. And I claim that there is no power under the Constitution to go behind these acts of a State which are verified under the Constitution and under the law.

The words of the Constitution in regard to the counting of the electoral votes are few. They are simply that "the President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted."

These are the words of the Constitution. So far as they express directly what is to be done they are unambiguous. So far as they declare how and by whom it shall be done they are not clear, and have received different interpretations by the wisest statesmen regardless of party, from the early days of the Republic until the present time. The commentators on the Constitution, those great authorities whom lawyers refer to, have expressed themselves with care, if not without hesitancy, as to the meaning of this portion of the Constitution.

Chancellor Kent, in his learned treatise, says of this claim—

The Constitution does not expressly declare by whom the votes are to be counted and the result declared. In the case of questionable votes and a closely contested election this power may be all important, and I presume, in the absence of all legislative provision on the subject, the President of the Senate counts the votes and determines the result, and that the two Houses are present only as spectators, to witness the fairness and accuracy of the transaction, and to act only if no choice be made by the electors.

The certificates are required to be opened in the presence of both Houses and the votes then counted. By whom counted? If by the President of the Senate, the Constitution does not expressly say so. If by Congress, why did it not say so? If the omission was intentional, as may be reasonably presumed, the apparent explanation is that it was intended to leave the mode and persons or tribunal to be provided by law, if it should seem best to Congress to make such provision.

I agree with the gentleman from Kentucky that words of an instrument are to be taken in their plain and obvious meaning, but believe it to be a well-known principle of legal construction that, when the language is uncertain, indefinite, or ambiguous, it is proper and necessary to seek for the true meaning of the Constitution by inquiring how its framers and those who adopted it understood its provisions.

"The votes shall then be counted." In these few words is summed up the whole direction of the Constitution as to how and by whom the count itself is to be made. How shall we ascertain and understand the meaning of the Constitution and what its framers intended, unless, following the language of a learned commentator on the Constitution, we seek for light by inquiring what was the understanding of the framers of the Constitution themselves. To the propriety of such a course I call the attention of the House. Story on the Constitution, volume 1, section 408, says. I will ask the Clerk to read the portion I have marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

But after all a most unexceptionable source of collateral interpretation is from the practical exposition of the Government itself in its various departments upon particular questions discussed and settled upon their own and single merits. These approach nearer in their own nature to judicial exposition and for the same general recommendation that belongs to the latter.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. Let us refer to the action of the framers of the Constitution. If we examine the history of the article in the Constitution relating to the Executive, by reference to the journal of the convention, we find that it appeared first as a resolution for the appointment of an Executive. Some of these resolutions were referred to a committee. Mr. Brearley, on the 4th of September, from a committee of eleven, who had been considering the subject, reported back an article in relation to the Executive that contains substantially the draught of this article as it appears in the Constitution at the time it was adopted and as subsequently amended. In regard to the count itself, after having in the previous section provided how the electors should cast their ballots, and that they should make lists, and that these should be transmitted to the seat of the General Government directed to the President of the Senate, it provided in section 7 that—

The President of the Senate shall, in that House, open all the certificates, and the votes shall be then and there counted.

On the 6th of September this article came up for consideration before the convention; and it was moved, among other amendments, that the words "in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives" should be inserted after the word "counted;" and this was sustained by the vote of six States voting "ay" against four voting "no;" so that the clause read—

The President of the Senate shall, in that House, open all the certificates, and the votes shall be then and there counted in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives.

The limitation here was that they should be counted in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives. I put it to every gentleman whether the language here used, together with the amendment providing that the count should be in the presence of these two bodies, does not exclude the idea that they themselves are to make the count? If they were to count it would be necessary that they should be present in order to do so; but if the vote were to be counted by the President of the Senate or by some person under his direction or by any other authority provided by Congress, then the limitation is proper; and the language means that the counting should be done by the President of the Senate, by persons that he should name, or by tellers or any commission or any one else expressly authorized by law to count in the presence of these two bodies. And there is no vote of the convention, no word in the debates, no language anywhere expressed by any proposition submitted to the convention that changes or modifies this action of the convention.

Subsequently, on the 9th of September, all these matters were referred to a committee of revision consisting of five members, who were appointed by ballot. This committee consisted of Mr. Johnson, Mr. Hamilton, Mr. G. Morris, Mr. Madison, and Mr. King. On the 12th of September, the third day afterward, this committee submitted the draught of the Constitution, which was adopted and signed. It appears that this committee, or the committee of eleven, changed the form so as to make the expression more concise and elegant than the manner in which the proposition had been presented and adopted. But there was no vote of the convention in regard to the change; and there seems to have been no idea on the part of the committee on revision, or the convention itself, that they were doing anything to change the vote of the convention.

Now, one day afterward, this committee, whose names I have given, introduced a resolution stating their opinion in regard to the count of this very vote, which I submit. It is as follows:

Resolved, That it is the opinion of this convention that as soon as the conventions of nine States shall have ratified this Constitution the United States in Congress assembled should fix a day on which electors should be appointed by the States which shall have ratified the same, and a day on which the electors should assemble to vote for the President, and the time and place for commencing proceedings under this Constitution. That after such publication, the electors should be appointed and the Senators and Representatives elected. That the electors should meet on the day fixed for the election of the President, and should transmit their votes, certified, signed, sealed, and directed, as the Constitution requires, to the Secretary of the United States in Congress assembled; that the Senators and Representatives should convene at the time and place assigned; that the Senators should appoint a President of the Senate, for the sole purpose of receiving, opening, and counting the votes for President; and that after he shall be chosen, the Congress, together with the President, should, without delay, proceed to execute this Constitution.

That resolution declares it to be the opinion of this convention that as soon as the conventions of nine States had ratified, &c., electors should be appointed; that the electors should meet and transmit their votes to the Secretary of the United States in Congress assembled; that Senators and Representatives should convene; that the Senators should appoint a President of the Senate for the sole purpose of receiving, opening, and counting the votes for President, and that after he should be chosen, the Congress, together with the President, should without delay proceed to execute this Constitution. That resolution was passed by the convention, and accompanies its proceedings.

Now, the propositions submitted to the House, both by the majority and the minority, present this question: In the absence of any legislation, in the absence of any direction from the two Houses of Congress, if they have authority to make such direction, how is the vote to be counted? We say that it is to be counted just as the members of the convention expressed their opinion that it should be counted. They said, when Congress should assemble and the count was to be made, it being impossible under the Constitution that, prior to the election of a President, any law could be passed by which the counting could be provided for, it devolved ex necessitate on the President of the Senate to receive the certificates, to open them, and to count the vote. That was the expressed opinion of the framers of the Constitution in regard to the duty to be performed in the emergency that now presents itself to Congress. What shall be done and what powers has the House in the execution of its duty in case no law is passed or no direction given that has the authority to bind the House or bind the officer in making the count? That is the identical question which was passed upon by the convention and is to be passed upon by this House in voting upon the resolutions here presented.

Now, it cannot be said that the reason of this recommendation of the convention was because the Constitution at the time contemplated would not be in force. The Constitution must have been ratified before even the electors could be chosen. The two Houses must assemble and a constitutional quorum must be in attendance before they could be present at the count. But the Constitution being in force, the two Houses having assembled and proceeded in accordance with that resolution, the question that presented itself to the framers of the Constitution was who, under that instrument, in the absence of legislation, is to count the vote? And they said in unmistakable language who, as they understood, was to count and declare the vote; and that was the President of the Senate.

Now, I desire to refer briefly to the action of Congress on the occasion of the first and the succeeding counts. I hold that the four counts which were conducted prior to the re-adoption of this provision in the twelfth article of the amendments—that those four, public, open, well-understood exercises of the power by Congress and by the President of the Senate in regard to receiving, opening, counting, and declaring the vote, became, according to a principle of construction thoroughly established in the courts, a part of the Constitution itself, and must be held to have been recognized and adopted by the people as the true method in re-adopting in the same language this provision.

What were the proceedings in connection with this first count? Examine them. Did Congress jointly or separately undertake to reject a single vote. No, in no instance. Look at the proceedings at the first count, as shown by the Journals. The Senate Journal states:

April 6, 1789.

The Senate proceeded by ballot to the choice of a President for the sole purpose of opening and counting the votes for President of the United States.

John Langdon, esq., was elected.

Ordered, That Mr. Ellsworth inform the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate is formed; that a President is elected for the sole purpose of opening the certificates and counting the votes of the electors of the several States in the choice of a President and Vice-President of the United States; and that the Senate is now ready, in the Senate Chamber, to proceed in the presence of the House to discharge that duty; and that the Senate have appointed one of their members to sit at the clerk's table to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared; submitting it to the wisdom of the House to appoint one or more of their members for the like purpose.

On the same day Mr. Ellsworth subsequently reported that he had delivered the message. Then

Mr. Boudinot, from the House of Representatives, communicated the following verbal message to the Senate:

"Mr. PRESIDENT: I am directed by the House of Representatives to inform the Senate that the House is ready forthwith to meet the Senate to attend the opening and counting of the votes of the electors of the President and Vice-President of the United States."

And he withdrew.

The Speaker and the House of Representatives attended in the Senate Chamber for the purpose expressed in the message delivered by Mr. Ellsworth; and after some time withdrew.

The Senate then proceeded by ballot to the choice of a President of their body pro tempore. John Langdon, esq., was duly elected.

The President elected for the purpose of counting the votes declared to the Senate that the Senate and House of Representatives had met, and that he, in their presence, had opened and counted the votes of the electors for President and Vice-President of the United States, which were as follows.

In view of these proceedings no wonder a distinguished Senator whose political opinions are in accord with the majority of this House felt compelled to acknowledge that—

Certainly it must be admitted that, looking at that record alone, it would seem as if the idea at the commencement of the Government was that the President of the Senate was not only to open but that he was to count the votes.

The resolution of the House in regard to attending the count was:

Resolved, That Mr. Speaker, attended by the House, do now withdraw to the Senate Chamber for the purpose expressed in the message from the Senate; and that Mr. Parker and Mr. Heister be appointed on the part of this House to sit at the Clerk's table with the member of the Senate and make a list of the votes as the same shall be declared.

After the count the House returned to its own Hall, and Messrs. Parker and Heister "delivered in at the Clerk's table a list of the votes of the electors of the several States in a choice of a President and Vice-President of the United States, as the same were declared by the President of the Senate in the presence of the Senate and of the House;" which was ordered to be entered on the House Journal.

The proceedings in the three succeeding counts were substantially the same as at the first. Tellers were appointed by each House "to make lists of the votes as they shall be declared."

The notifications of readiness to attend specified the purpose to be "to attend the opening and counting the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States, as the Constitution provides."

What was the extent of the power which each House claimed and exercised? It was simply to arrange for a time and place of meeting and for appointment of tellers to sit at the Clerk's desk and take a list of the votes as they should be declared, and the making of a record of the result. That is all they did. They had a right to do that; it was their duty to do it. Because under the provision of the Constitution that, in case no one has a majority of the votes, it shall then become the duty of the House and the Senate respectively to exercise certain powers conferred upon them by the Constitution, the Houses of Congress have the right to be present, and, being present, can appoint certain of its members or its clerks or other persons "to make lists of the votes as they are declared." They did exercise that right, and that is the extent to which they went during the first four counts of the electoral votes. Go through them, examine carefully all the proceedings of Congress, look at the requests for the appointment of committees, see the authority under which those committees were appointed, the resolutions reported by the committees and adopted by the House, and you will find in no case did it exercise or claim to exercise any other power. In fact all that Congress claimed was to designate the place where and the time when the two Houses should meet and agree that they would be present to see the certificates opened and the votes counted. That was the extent of all their resolutions.

Now, if there is any doubt as to this action, whether the members of the First Congress, or the Second, or Third, or Fourth Congresses rightly understood the intention of the framers of the Constitution, that doubt is removed when we find that there were members of the constitutional convention which framed the very Constitution under which we are acting, who were members of the Senate and House of Representatives at the time when these votes were first counted. In the First Congress there were fifteen members of the constitutional convention who as members of the Senate or House were present at the time when the electoral votes were first counted, namely: In the Senate, John Langdon, William S. Johnson, Oliver Ellsworth, William Paterson, Robert Morris, George Read, Richard Basset, Pierce Butler, and William Few. In the House, Nicholas Gilman, Roger Sherman, George Clymer, Daniel Carroll, James Madison, jr., and Abraham Baldwin. Nearly all of them were present at the counting of the electoral votes, and tacitly assented to the proceedings and count.

In the Second Congress there were twelve members of that constitutional convention present, and in the Third and Fourth six members of that constitutional convention. Will gentlemen of the present day say that the men who helped frame the Constitution of the United States, the very men most prominent in that constitutional convention, did not understand what the Constitution meant and did not know what they intended in adopting its provisions? Would they not have risen in their places and protested with all the vehemence they could that the count was not being conducted in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution? It seems to me the conclusion is irresistible that the manner in which this count was then conducted under the resolution of the constitutional convention and under the resolutions of Congress immediately afterward is the extent of the power that it was deemed, by the members of the convention itself and by the first Congresses after the adoption of the Constitution, this House had the right to exercise.

It cannot be claimed that because in the first meeting of Congress under the Constitution, and subsequently until the present time, tellers have been appointed, therefore Congress took control of the count. What is the duty of a teller? It is merely the ministerial duty of enumerating. In this House no teller has power to say what vote shall be counted. That power never has been exercised by a teller. If it is believed that a person not authorized to vote is passing between the tellers, the question is submitted to the presiding officer or the person having charge of the count, and there is no appeal from his decision, which is final and peremptory, subject merely to the right of the bodies, after he has disposed of the question, to act upon and criticise, and, if they deem proper, to censure the officer who makes that decision.

But until the count is concluded and the declaration of the count made, the tellers have no authority to stop the proceedings or to interfere with the count. All that the two Houses authorized to be done was that tellers should be appointed who should sit at the Clerk's desk and make lists of the votes as they are declared.

But there is another remarkable circumstance. The committee to devise a method for notifying the President as to the result of the count, and to certify to him his election, prepared a form. There were three members of the constitutional convention who were members of the committee which drafted that form of notification, namely, Mr. Patterson, Mr. Johnson, and Mr. Ellsworth. They devised a form which was signed by John Langdon, the president appointed under the resolution to count the vote, in which he certified that he had opened the certificates and counted the votes. Congress directed him to certify that he had opened the certificates and counted the votes, and he did make such a certificate and signed it. John Langdon, who had been a member of the constitutional convention himself, certified that he had opened the certificates and counted the votes. The form of the certificate, carefully prepared by the committee and reported as a form, was passed upon by the Senate and approved and entered upon the Journal, as follows:

> Be it known, that the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, being convened in the city and State of New York, the sixth day of April, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and eighty-nine, the underwritten, appointed President of the Senate for the sole purpose of receiving, opening, and counting the votes of the electors, did, in the presence of the said Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and count all the votes of the electors for a President and for a Vice-President; by which it appears that George Washington, esquire, was unanimously elected, agreeably to the Constitution, to the office of President of the United States of America.

> JOHN LANGDON.

John Adams, too, is supposed to have known something about the Constitution. He was Vice President and presiding officer to count the vote, and he signed a certificate in 1797, acting then as Vice-President and as President of the Senate, that he had opened the certificates and counted the votes.

Thomas Jefferson, the father of the democracy as it is claimed—and I am astonished that those who claim to be his children should deny and go back upon his early teachings in regard to the rights of the States—Thomas Jefferson in 1801 signed a certificate in which he stated—

> That * * * on the second Wednesday of February, A. D. 1801, the underwritten, Vice-President of the United States and President of the Senate, did, in the presence of the said Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and count all the votes of the electors for President. * * *

> THOMAS JEFFERSON.

Did not these men understand what the Constitution meant in regard to the duty of the President of the Senate? Did not the people, after these public declarations had been made and had been spread upon the Journals of the Senate and were known to the world—did not the people know that the framers of the Constitution had interpreted its provisions in this manner and that the power in reference to counting and certifying the electoral votes had been exercised in this way? Did not they know—did not the people know what had been done and claimed? And will it be said they did not adopt the interpretation given by these public men to the provisions of the Constitution relating to the count of the electoral votes and did not intend that in any case it should be exercised by the President of the Senate? It seems to me the conviction must be irresistible that, in the absence of all legislation or authorized concurrent direction from the two legislative bodies required to be present, he must count or cause to be counted the electoral votes.

I do not deny the power of Congress to legislate upon the subject. I believe that it is not only the power of Congress, but the duty of Congress. It did legislate upon the subject in 1792, but it did not in my judgment go to the extent which Congress ought to have gone in providing a method by which the count should be carried on and the result ascertained and declared.

I might fortify my own opinions by reference to the opinions of distinguished statesmen who were members of the democratic party, who, before any practical question arose in the last and in prior Congresses, have avowed their convictions that the President of the Senate was the proper person to count the electoral vote, some of them even claiming that there is no power in Congress to take it away from the President of the Senate. But I do not care to refer to the opinions of others. I desire that this question should be met and, if it is to be discussed in the House, discussed upon its merits as a great constitutional question, to be calmly, carefully, and impartially investigated, each man acting upon the resolutions presented, in view of the oath that he takes as a Representative to discharge his duty. In the examination that I have made of this question I have endeavored to keep that in view, and not to give effect to my convictions as a partisan or with a view to the effect it may have upon the pending count.

I believe that under the provision of law that gives the power to Congress by legislation to carry into effect any power that is conferred upon the United States, or any Department, or upon Congress, under that power there is ample authority to legislate and to direct how the count shall be made. The only question that is now stirring the House, that presents itself, is, if we make no provision, what can we do? Can we as a House stand back and defiantly assert our right to reject any vote? That is the doctrine that is presented; that this House, with no constitutional power except only that given it by virtue of the Constitution, has the right to pass, of its own motion, upon the action of a State; that it is not to be governed by the certificates of the State officers; that it is not to be governed by their action; that it can go behind that; and there are committees of this House that insist that they have the right to go behind the action of the State authorities, and to purge every poll in the United States and to investigate the proceedings of political parties prior to the election and investigate every poll and what was done, and claim that that is within the powers of the Constitution, asserting for this House a greater power than the constituent French Assembly asserted for itself during the days of the French revolution.

I am glad that calmer thoughts and better feelings are prevailing, as I think, in regard to the duty of Congress at this time, and that this question is to be met in more of a conciliatory spirit, giving to each side and to each gentleman credit for honesty in their convictions, feeling that above all things there can be no emergency that will arise to justify a resort to strife, to threats, and to violence. Such a time ought not and can never come, I believe, in the history of this American Government. I have faith enough in republican institutions, in the genuine democracy, and in the intelligence of the people, to believe that you can trust the people, and I hope their Representatives, to respect the forms of law and to permit the peaceful solution of political questions by the proper tribunals; and that it is idle, that it is worse than idle, it is wicked, it is unpatriotic, to talk, as I am glad to say but few have talked upon this floor, about what may come and what will be done in case of an emergency that may, in their opinion, arise.

I might reply to some remarks that I have heard made in discussion here but I do not know whether it is necessary. The distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] now acting chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, in his speech defining the exercise of the powers of the States in the electoral vote, claims that this is a delegated power, delegated by the Constitution, as if it were a power existing somewhere before the Constitution was adopted. If so, where? What is really meant by "delegated by the Constitution?" Did the Constitution of itself delegate anything, any more than a deed conveys property? When duly executed by some person, the party signing the deed makes the grant and not the deed which evidences it. The powers conferred by the Constitution come from the States; that is, the people constituting the States.

Every power created or delegated contained in the Constitution was a power conferred by the people or the States, and did not emanate from the Constitution itself. Why, the State-rights party in the days of the adoption of the Constitution were so tenacious of this right that they would not adopt the Constitution unless it should be accompanied by amendments; or at least in their conventions adopting the Constitution they submitted the first eleven articles of amendment, one of which provided that the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people. There was no power that Congress held, no rights which it held by virtue of charters or grants from the Crown; but all power conferred, defined, limited, or implied in the Constitution was granted by the States, and the people of the States, and not by the Constitution itself. The Constitution was the written expression of the grant, and hence it is idle to say that this is a power conferred upon the States, unless the gentleman means that the people acting through their State conventions gave to the States as corporate existences the right to appoint the electors; and if that is his meaning, I deny his conclusion that the power is therefore limited, for the fifth article of amendments to the Constitution does not limit the powers created or delegated to the States, but only the powers granted to the Federal Government.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it appears to me that the doctrine asserted in the fifth resolution is utterly subversive of the reserved rights of the States.

There is no redress from this illegal assumption if the result of such a partial count is final and conclusive. It places a veto power in the House of Representatives upon the choice of the duly appointed officers of the State authorized to elect the President and Vice-President of the United States. It declares that the House, by a bare majority, acting upon the opinion, whim, caprice, or partisan bias of its members, can invalidate the votes duly given by presidential electors and certified according to law. It claims the right to the House to question and set aside the appointment as well as the votes of electors and in effect itself appoint the electors.

I now yield the remainder of my time to my colleague upon my right, [Mr. HURLBUT.]

Mr. HURLBUT. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the gentleman yield to me to make a privileged motion?

Mr. HURLBUT. If it is a privileged motion.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. FOSTER. I move that the House grant the request of the Senate for a committee of conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the bill (H. R. No. 4307) making appropriations to supply certain deficiencies in the contingent fund of the House of Representatives, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

The Speaker announced as the conferees on the part of the House Mr. FOSTER, Mr. HOLMAN, and Mr. BLOUNT.

EXTENSION OF CAPITOL GROUNDS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds Senate bill No. 1113, to authorize the taking of certain parcels of land for the public use at the intersection of Pennsylvania and Maryland avenues, on the west front of the Capitol Square.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

ROBERT ERWIN.

Mr. HARTRIDGE. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table House bill No. 231, which has been returned from the Senate with an amendment, for the purpose of moving a concurrence in the amendment.

No objection was made, and the bill (H. R. No. 231) for the relief of Robert Erwin was taken from the Speaker's table.

The amendment of the Senate was to strike out all after the enacting clause, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

That the Court of Claims may take jurisdiction under the provisions of the act of March 12, 1863, entitled "An act to provide for the collection of abandoned property and for the prevention of frauds in insurrectionary districts within the United States," of the claims of Robert Erwin, of Savannah, Georgia, for property alleged to have been taken from him, which claims were by accident or mistake of his agent or attorney, and without fault or neglect on his part, as is claimed, not filed within the time limited by said act.

The amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

Mr. HARTRIDGE moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the Senate was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RIVER AND HARBOR IMPROVEMENT.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting the report of the Chief of Engineers, under section 3, of the river and harbor act of August 14, 1876; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

MAJOR JUSTUS M'KINSTRY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, relative to a report of the court-martial of Major Justus McKinstry; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. STONE moved that the communication just referred be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 685) to place the name of Daniel H. Kelly upon the muster-roll of Company F, Second Tennessee Infantry; and

An act (S. No. 1040) to authorize sundry allowances to James Atkins, late collector of internal revenue for the fourth district of Georgia, in the settlement of his accounts.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HURLBUT] that the House now adjourn.

Mr. HURLBUT. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WILLIS] desires to take the floor in his own right upon the report of the select committee of the rights and privileges of the House. I will withdraw my motion to adjourn and yield to him for that purpose.

Mr. WILLIS. I am willing to yield for a motion to adjourn.

Mr. HURLBUT. Then I make that motion.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at three o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BANNING: The petition of Ann Gregory, widow of Charles N. Gregory, of Washington, District of Columbia, that the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to refund to her the sum of $1,500, the amount of money paid by her late husband for certain real estate purchased from the United States at a confiscation sale in Alexandria, Virginia, which sale has been declared void by the Supreme Court of the United States, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. CUTLER: Protest of citizens of Roxbury Township, Mercer County, New Jersey, against the assumption of the President of the Senate of the power of determining who has been elected President of the United States, to the committee on counting the electoral vote.

By Mr. KIDDER: The petition of Thomas Faloon and 230 other citizens of Dakota Territory, that pre-emptors may have their filings changed to homesteads, and credit given them of the time they have resided on the land as pre-emptors, to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. THORNBURGH: The petition of S. E. Rankin, and others, of Tennessee, that pensioners be paid from the date of their discharge from the Army, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. TURNEY: The petition of citizens of Westmoreland County, Pennsylvania, for the enforcement of the provisions of the act of Congress of July 24, 1866, relating to the purchase of telegraph lines by the General Government, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Also, the petition of citizens of Fayette County, Pennsylvania, of similar import, to the same committee.

By Mr. WILLIAMS, of Delaware: The petition of citizens of Milford, Delaware, of similar import, to the same committee.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, January 19, 1877.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 4448) to remove the political disabilities of A. W. Burnet, of South Carolina, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

CREDENTIALS.

Mr. HAMLIN presented the credentials of JAMES G. BLAINE, elected by the Legislature of the State of Maine a Senator from that State to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Lot M. Morrill; which were read and ordered to be filed.

He also presented the credentials of JAMES G. BLAINE, elected by the Legislature of the State of Maine a Senator from that State for the term beginning March 4, 1877; which were read and ordered to be filed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I am requested by the governor of the State of Pennsylvania to present to the Senate certain resolutions passed by the Legislature of Pennsylvania and I ask that the resolutions be read. The resolutions were ordered to lie on the table and were read, as follows:

Whereas the tranquillity of the country has been disturbed and its business prosperity imperiled by the extraordinary difficulty of ascertaining, in the nearly balanced vote, what has been the result of the late election for the electors of President and Vice-President;

And whereas to allay any excitement that may endanger the public peace and precipitate upon the people the calamities of civil war, from which they have been lately delivered, it seems fit and proper that the Legislatures of the States whose prerogatives and vital interests are involved in the issue should declare and emphasize those principles embodied in the national Constitution by which the decision of the pending question can alone be safely and lawfully reached:

Resolved by the senate, (the house of representatives concurring,) That the will of the people in electing a President and Vice-President of the United States can only be expressed in the manner prescribed by the Constitution, and the persons having the majority of the votes of the electors appointed by the States of the Union in the manner prescribed by the Legislatures thereof must be, by the force of the Constitution and laws, declared President and Vice-President respectively, and must be on the 4th of March inaugurated, and thereafterward duly respected as such.

Second. That all factious opposition, and all threats of violence, designed or intended to prevent or imperil the declaration and confirmation of the constitutional election of the President and Vice-President, are unpatriotic in spirit, dangerous and revolutionary in tendency, and merit and should receive the condemnation of an outraged and indignant people.

Third. That the lists which the duly appointed electors of the States respectively are required by the Constitution of the United States to make of the persons voted for as President and Vice-President, and the number of votes for each, and which are to be by the electors certified and transmitted by them sealed to the President of the Senate, and which certificates are to be opened by him in the presence of the two Houses of Congress, and counted, are the constitutional evidence of the votes cast for President and Vice-President.

Fourth. That under the Constitution the persons having the majority of all the votes actually cast by the duly appointed electors of the States, respectively, are, by force of the Constitution and laws, the President and Vice-President from and after the beginning of their term of office, and any attempt to defeat the election of a President or of a Vice-President by either House of Congress upon the pretext that certain persons duly certified to be the electors of any State were not such electors, or by throwing out or refusing to count the legally certified votes of any State, or by impeding the counting of the electoral vote to ascertain the result, or for any other cause than that provided for in the Constitution, when no person has a majority of votes of the electors duly appointed, will be a proceeding fraught with danger to the public peace, perilous to the stability of our Government, and exposing our nation to contempt in the general opinion of mankind.

Resolved, That our Senators in Congress be instructed and our Representatives requested to let their action on this question conform to the spirit of this declaration.

Resolved, That the governor be requested to have a copy of this preamble and resolutions forwarded to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress as early as convenient.

The foregoing preamble and resolutions have passed the Legislature.

THOS. B. COCHRAN,
Clerk of the Senate.
WM. C. SHURLOCK,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

JANUARY 16, 1877.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a petition of a large number of citizens of Ohio, praying the passage of the act allowing pensioners the amount of arrears to which they would be entitled by a removal from the statutes of the unjust limitation which has debarred many from receiving their just dues, and that they shall be entitled to receive in all cases pension from the date of discharge of the soldier; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SHERMAN. I also present the petition of Levi & Co., of Cincinnati, Ohio, praying the repeal of the law imposing a tax on the circulation, deposits, and capital of banks, stating that it affects them injuriously and affects the public as well injuriously. I move its reference to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COOPER presented the petition of the Louisville conference, the petition of the East Texas conference, the petition of the North Georgia conference, the petition of the South Carolina conference, the petition of the Virginia conference, the petition of the Memphis conference, the petition of the North Mississippi conference, the petition of the Alabama conference, the petition of the North Alabama conference, and the petition of the Mississippi conference, praying for settlement and payment of the claim of the Southern Methodist Publishing House; which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MERRIMON presented a resolution of the Legislature of North Carolina, in favor of amending the laws relating to currency, so as to prohibit national banks from taking more than 8 per cent. interest; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of the Good Templars of North Carolina, officially signed, praying for prohibitory legislation for the District of Columbia and the Territories; the prohibition of the foreign importation of alcoholic liquors; that total abstinence be made a condition of the civil, military, and naval service, and for a constitutional amendment to prohibit the traffic in alcoholic beverages throughout the national domain; which was referred to the Committe on Finance.

Mr. JONES, of Florida, presented the petition of Lucius A. Hardee, of Honeymoon, Florida, praying the appointment of a committee to examine his method of effectually destroying the locust or grasshopper of the West by concussion, and also to examine into the history, nature, and habits of the grasshopper and suggest some means of their destruction; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. BOGY presented a petition of citizens of Missouri, praying an amendment of the pension laws, so as to allow arrearages of pensions; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CONKLING. I present petitions numerously signed by citizens of New York, praying legislation restricting and preventing in the Territories and the District of Columbia, the sale of alcoholic drinks as a beverage. Such petitions, I believe, have gone heretofore to the Committee on Finance. I move the reference of these to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

He also presented the petition of James C. Jewett, of the city of New York, praying to be indemnified, out of the unappropriated moneys of the Geneva award, for losses sustained by the depredations of the confederate vessels Florida and Alabama; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of citizens of the State of New York, praying the passage of an act granting pensions from the date of the discharge of the soldier, and for payment of arrears now due; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. EDMUNDS presented a resolution of the Legislature of Vermont, in favor of the repeal of the bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BOUTWELL presented the petition of William King and others of Monson, Massachusetts, praying for the passage of a bill granting arrears of pension to Charlotte Brooks; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BRUCE presented the petition of D. R. Avery, and other citizens of North Collins, New York, praying for a general law to prohibit the liquor traffic within the national jurisdiction; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 231) for the relief of Heartt, Waite & Dodge, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. SPENCER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the petition of O. S. B. Wall and others, citizens of the District of Columbia, praying a grant of public land for the purpose of endowing a home for the indigent poor of the District of Columbia, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4202) to amend the charter of the Mutual Fire-Insurance Company of the District of Columbia, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4041) to prevent depredations upon property in the District of Columbia, reported it without amendment.

Mr. DORSEY, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3558) to provide for the settlement of tax-lien certificates erroneously issued by the late authorities of the District of Columbia, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a memorial of citizens of the District of Columbia asking the passage of an act authorizing and empowering the board of audit of the District of Columbia to receive and adjust claims for damages to property occasioned by the change of the grade of Pennsylvania avenue provided for by the act of July 8, 1870, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. BRUCE, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3499) granting a pension to William Buckley, private Company C, Fiftieth Ohio Volunteers, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2702) granting a pension to Bridget T. Hopper, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. WEST, from the Committee on Railroads, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1134) to create a sinking fund for the liquidation of the Government bonds advanced to the Central Pacific Railroad Company of California, and the Western Pacific Railroad Company, and to the Union Pacific Railroad Company, under and in pursuance of the act of Congress entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862, and the acts amending the same or supplemental thereto, and for the settlement of the claims of the Government on account of said bonds, reported it with amendments.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SARGENT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1159) authorizing the sale and private entry of certain tracts of land within the limits of Salt Lake City, Utah Territory; which was read twice by its title, and, together with the accompanying memorial, referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SPENCER (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1160) for the relief of Thomas H. Bradley; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WINDOM asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1161) for the relief of Nathan Butler, of Minnesota; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DORSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1162) providing for funding certificates of the board of audit; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PADDOCK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1163) for the relief of settlers on the public lands under the pre-emption laws; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House insisted upon its disagreement to the seventh and eighth amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 4307) making appropriations to supply certain deficiencies in the contingent fund of the House of Representatives, and for other purposes; that it insisted upon its amendment to the twelfth amendment of the Senate to the said bill; that it agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. CHARLES FOSTER of Ohio, Mr. WILLIAM S. HOLMAN of Indiana, and Mr. JAMES H. BLOUNT of Georgia managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 231) for the relief of Robert Erwin.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 685) to place the name of Daniel H. Kelly upon the muster-roll of Company F, Second Tennessee Infantry; and

A bill (S. No. 1040) to authorize sundry allowances to James Atkins, late collector of internal revenue for the fourth district of Georgia, in the settlement of his accounts.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC BILL.

Mr. SARGENT. If there be no further morning business, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4251) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1878, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. SARGENT. Before the amendments reported by the Committee on Appropriations are considered, I will make a few general remarks as to the difference between this bill and the bill which was passed by agreement between the two Houses at the last session. The changes are very few. Substantially it is the bill passed at the last session. There are two additions made to the amount of appropriations by the House of Representatives; one for contingent expenses of foreign intercourse proper, to the amount of $10,000, and one for the relief of American seamen, to the extent of $10,000, making in all $20,000 in addition. The Committee on Appropriations have examined into these items of expenditure and think that these additions are judicious. Therefore, they recommend the House bill in that respect.

The reductions in this bill are in the salaries of consuls, vice-consuls, &c., $32,600. This, however, is not really a deduction from the appropriation of last year's bill, but in the footing made last year of the appropriations necessary to pay the salaries of consuls, vice-consuls, &c., an error of $32,600 was made in the haste of the close of the session. This was understood by myself immediately after the passage of the bill and its signature by the President, and I sent information to the State Department of this error, and of the real intention of Congress in the passage of the bill; and the amount of $32,600 of the appropriation made was not expended. Consequently we appropriate as much for next year by this bill as will be expended this year, under last session's bill.

The House has reduced upon the item of the Spanish claims commission $3,512.50, which the Senate committee consider injurious, and when we reach that item which the committee propose to amend, I will more particularly explain the reasons for the amendment we propose.

Ten thousand dollars reduction is made in the item of expenses for the execution of the neutrality act. As the expenditure for a number of years past has been less than $10,000 per annum on this account, it is thought perhaps $10,000 will be possibly sufficient for the coming year. If, however, there should be a Fenian war or if there should be a general European war, which is threatened, the amount of $10,000 will not be sufficient; but Congress will probably meet in time to make another appropriation if a contingency shall arise.

The item of compensation to consular and diplomatic officers, $25,000, appropriated last year to pay the expenses of the transit home of persons whose offices were abolished, is not repeated this year. This makes, therefore, a reduction of $25,000 in the apparent appropriation, but it is unnecessary because it was for a temporary purpose which has now been accomplished.

For clerks to consulates a reduction of $600 is made, to which the Senate committee take no exception.

With these explanations, I ask that the bill be read and that action be taken on the amendments as they are reached.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the suggestion? The Chair hears none.

Mr. ANTHONY. I should like to ask the Senator who has the bill in charge if there is any legislation in the bill as it comes from the House.

Mr. SARGENT. Not a line of legislation in the bill as it comes from the House of Representatives.

Mr. ANTHONY. We have now adopted a rule which goes into force on Monday that we will not put legislation on appropriation bills, which I think is a very proper rule. If we are not to permit ourselves to put any legislation on such bills, I think we ought to establish the principle in limine that we will not accept legislation from the other House on these bills. We ought to stand on a perfect equality with the other House in that respect.

Mr. SARGENT. There is no legislation on this bill or I should have called the attention of the Senate to it. I do not know that it is necessary to read this bill through at length. There are only one or two changes. I suggest that the Clerk read only the amendments. The first one is on page 8, line 162.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and only the amendments reported will be read.

Mr. STEVENSON. Has the bill been read at all?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has not been read through in committee.

Mr. STEVENSON. Does not the Senator want the bill read?

Mr. SARGENT. With the exception of those parts I point out, it is a literal reproduction of the bill which passed both Houses and was signed by the President last year. I have no objection to its being read at length except the time consumed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, only the portions of the bill proposed to be amended will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations, which was in line 162 to strike out "Algiers."

Mr. SARGENT. Algiers is stricken out because the consulate there was abolished sometime since and there is no necessity for it. It was probably put in by an oversight in the House. It is not in the estimates. If it remain, it will be necessary to increase the appropriation $1,500 for a useless consulate.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations was on page 12, line 265, after the word "commissioner," to strike out "$3,000" and insert "$4,000;" in the same line, after the word "counsel," to strike out "$3,000" and insert "$4,000;" in line 266, after "secretary," to strike out "$900" and insert "$912.50;" and in line 268, after the words "contingent expenses," to strike out "$500" and insert "$1,000;" and in line 269 to strike out "$7,700" and insert "$10,212.50," so as to make the clause read:

For salaries and expenses of the United States and Spanish claims commission, namely: For commissioner, $4,000; for counsel, $4,000; for secretary, $912.50; for messenger, $300; for contingent expenses, $1,000; making in all the sum of $10,212.50.

Mr. SARGENT. The salary of the commissioner is not fixed by law; it has been fixed heretofore by appropriations; and in the bill of last year it was fixed at $4,500, and the salary of the counsel was fixed at the same amount. The House has in this bill reduced these by $1,500. There are some forty cases yet undetermined before the Spanish claims commission and some of them of considerable difficulty. No commissioner fit to pass upon cases of that kind, who would give the necessary labor to the work, and no counsel in ordinary practice would consent to work for $3,000 a year. The committee have not proposed to put the compensation back to $4,500, but to consent to a reduction of $500, fixing the compensation at $4,000.

I should like to say with reference to this commission that the time when it shall expire is not fixed by law; it still has the amount of unfinished business before it to which I have referred, and this commission is very useful to the Government of the United States in this way; and perhaps it should be continued; it is worth all it costs, for this reason: Persons who, some twenty years ago, or a less or greater period of time, came over to the United States, and obtained certificates of naturalization, perhaps remained long enough to get those certificates, not intending, however, to really become citizens of the United States, returned to Spain, and every month or two, as exigencies have arisen since that time, have sworn in various forms that they were Spanish citizens. A difficulty arises between us and Spain, as sometimes happens, involving our affairs in the island of Cuba, and these persons, being treated as Spanish subjects, produce their papers and at once insist that they are citizens of the United States. If their demands are not acceded to they come to the State Department and make their complaints of a miscellaneous character. The Secretary of State has been accustomed to send these persons at once to this commission. They either refuse to go there, and therefore show the hollowness of their pretensions, or if they go there that hollowness is soon discovered and the Government saves a very large amount of expense and an immense amount of annoyance. For that reason I think the policy of the law is well which seems to continue this commission, at any rate for some time longer. The House proposes that it shall continue through the next year, and the salaries we propose are not too much.

The same bill reduces the amount of compensation of the secretary by $12.50, which is hardly worth a difference between the two Houses were it not for the fact that $912.50 is just one-half the amount allowed to the secretary, the other half being paid by Spain, and we ought to pay as much as Spain does; and this is the amount which it was agreed upon between the two Governments should be paid. The House probably did not understand that circumstance, and made it a round sum of $900, which is the pay of a female clerk in one of the Departments here. But understanding, as probably will be explained in conference, that this $912.50 is one-half the amount of what was agreed upon to be paid by the two Governments, there will be no difficulty in their admitting the propriety of the balance of the appropriation.

The contingent expenses are reduced by the House from $1,000 to $500. The estimates are $1,500. I am informed by the Secretary of State that $500 will scarcely pay for the amount of translation that is necessary; and we save the amount of rent this year because we have moved this commission into the new State Department building, and several other expenses are saved.

With these moderate additions, we think the bill cannot be much improved.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There are no other amendments reported.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. C. C. SNIFFEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had this day approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. No. 678) for the relief of Ephraim P. Abbott; and

An act (S. No. 453) to authorize the Vancouver Water Company to lay water-pipes through the Fort Vancouver military reservation.

PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. WHYTE. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for the yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. WHYTE. I withdraw the motion, if there is any objection to it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to state to my friend from Maryland that the bill reported by the select committee, if it becomes a law, will have the first act to be done under it done on a week from Tuesday next, and therefore it is in my opinion essential that we should take up the bill to-morrow and proceed with its consideration, so that by next Tuesday we shall be able to take a final vote upon it and either destroy it by manly blows or pass it by a vote, and not smother it to death by evasion or postponement. It is essential therefore, and it is right to all sides of the question, that that bill should be taken up to-morrow and considered, and that its consideration should continue from day to day until we shall finally dispose of it one way or the other. I hope, therefore, that the Senate will not adjourn over, but will sit to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is withdrawn.

Mr. STEVENSON. I hope the Senator from Vermont will not call up the bill till Monday, and I will tell him the reason why. A great deal is to be done by private conference among Senators, by close examination, and I think that giving us Saturday for that purpose will effect more than probably would be accomplished by debate. I throw out the suggestion to him. Of course, I have no feeling about it. I concur with him that the earliest moment we get at the debate the better; but I suggest for his consideration that by examination and private intercourse with each other to-morrow we shall be able to come to a conclusion sooner.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In the present state of public emergency, I do not think I should do my duty if I assented to that suggestion. There are the mornings and the evenings for private conference and consultation. But this bill is a bill of great importance. It is either a good measure of safety and law for the country or it is an unconstitutional and bad measure; but that it affects great interests everybody will agree. Therefore it appears to me, inasmuch as if it is to be a law it must be a law speedily, that we ought to take it up at the earliest moment to-morrow and proceed to consider it and get as far with it as we can to-morrow—of course it will involve debate, and it ought to involve debate—so that we may be able to terminate it one way or the other at an early day next week.

Mr. WHYTE. I was under the impression that the Senator from Vermont did not propose to call up the bill until Monday, and therefore I made the proposition to enable Senators to prepare for the discussion of the bill between now and Monday. But inasmuch as the Senator now states that he will call it up to-morrow, I withdraw the motion I made, and shall vote against it if made by any other Senator.

COUNTING THE ELECTORAL VOTE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday, which is the resolution of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALLACE] to instruct the special committee on counting the electoral vote for President and Vice-President to inquire and report upon certain propositions in connection therewith, on which the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BOGY] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BOGY. Mr. President, I will now read the testimony from Morehouse Parish, beginning on page 705 of this volume of evidence:

STATE OF LOUISIANA,
Parish of Morehouse:

I, James M. Turpin, clerk of the fourteenth district court, in and for said parish and State, do hereby certify that no statement or protest of the commissioners of election, or of any one of them, or of the supervisor of election or other person, relative to the election held in said parish on the 7th of the present month under the provisions of section 26 of act approved November 20, 1872, has been filed in my office or been delivered to me as clerk of said court up to present date.

Given under my hand and seal of office, at Bastrop, Louisiana, on this 20th of November, A. D. 1876.

[SEAL.] JAS. M. TURPIN,
Clerk Fourteenth District Court.

STATE OF LOUISIANA,
Parish of Morehouse:

I have just seen a dispatch from Governor W. Pitt Kellogg to Mr. Chandler, bearing date New Orleans, November 6, and published in the New York Herald on the 7th instant, which dispatch, as far as it refers to the parish of Morehouse, is untrue in the following particulars: This parish at the time referred to in said dispatch was not patrolled by White Leagues or other persons, re-enforced by armed bodies from Arkansas and Mississippi, within my knowledge. I heard of no such, and the dispatch in this particular is incorrect. There has been no republicans murdered in this parish during this campaign on account of their politics that I know of. The colored voters were not prohibited from going to or returning from the parish site on the day of election nor previous thereto, that I ever heard of. On the day of election a large number of voters residing in different wards of this parish voted at the poll established at Bastrop, the parish site, without molestation or hinderance, so far as I know or could see. I never heard of the roads leading to Bastrop being picketed. I am the sheriff of the parish of Morehouse, and I have never been unable to execute any warrant of arrest that was placed in my hands, in any case where I could find the parties.

I was present at the poll located at Bastrop on the 7th of November, and the election at said poll was conducted peaceably and quietly, and every elector, both white and colored, voted for the men of their choice, so far as I know.

GEORGE A. PETIRKIN,
Sheriff Parish Morehouse.

I have just read the dispatch referred to herein, and I have read the above and foregoing statement of George A. Petirkin, sheriff of Morehouse, and I cheerfully concur and indorse said statement. I am a resident of Morehouse Parish, and parish attorney for said parish, and a republican, and vote the republican ticket. George A. Petirkin is likewise a republican.

FRANK VAUGHEN,
Parish Attorney pro tempore.

Sworn to and subscribed to before me this 13th day November, 1876.

A. L. BUSSEY,
Deputy Clerk, Fourteenth District

STATE OF LOUISIANA,
Parish of Morehouse:

I, L. R. Stark, do solemnly swear that I am a resident of ward No. 5, said parish; that I voted in said ward at the recent election on the 7th instant; that the election in said ward was a free, fair, and peaceable one; that previous the election the parish was not patrolled by the White League, re-enforced by armed bodies from Arkansas or elsewhere, and that the only armed bodies in the parish on or previous to the election were United States troops; that the republican leaders in said parish were not driven away or murdered previous to said election, or on the day thereof; that no republican voters, within my knowledge or that I heard of, were intercepted by White League pickets or other persons and prevented from going to the parish seat or other place in the parish to vote; that none were prevented from voting by being cruelly beaten or otherwise maltreated; that I saw nothing on the day of the election or previous thereto that was calculated to intimidate any voter or to hinder a free election; that the reported dispatch of Governor Kellogg to Hon. Z. Chandler, as far as relates to the parish of Morehouse, is utterly false in every particular.

L. R. STARK, M. D.,
United States Marshal's Posse

Sworn to and subscribed before me this 11th day of November, A. D. 1876.

W. H. SUMMERLIN,
Justice Peace of Fifth Ward.

Mr. PADDOCK. Mr. President, it is some time since the Senator from Missouri commenced to read the book from which he is now reading, and I have almost forgotten what the book is. I should be glad to be informed what it is.

Mr. BOGY. The evidence taken in New Orleans before the returning board. I am surprised the Senator did not know this without my telling him.

Mr. PADDOCK. It is too great a tax on the memory.

Mr. BOGY. You mean to say for your memory. I regret it is so feeble; that is your misfortune.

THE STATE OF LOUISIANA,
Parish of Orleans:

Personally came and appeared before me, W. T. Houston, a justice of the peace, duly commissioned, Samuel W. Riley, a resident of the fourth ward, parish of Morehouse, who, being duly sworn, deposes under oath that he was, in August, 1875, appointed tax-collector for the parish of Morehouse, and that since that date he has been constantly in the parish of Morehouse, and, having been a member of and voting with the republican party of the parish of Morehouse, that he has never known of any improper treatment to himself or republicans of the parish of Morehouse on account of their political faith, and that he has always felt free to go to any part of said parish, and verily believes that no member of the republican party has been in any danger of bodily harm or political proscription on account of his political opinions. He further swears that he has never known of any violence or threats made to any colored man on account of his color or political opinions by any member of the democratic-conservative party of said parish during the time of registration or on the day of election; that on the 7th day of November, A. D. 1876, he was during the entire day at the fourth ward precinct, which is in the town of Bastrop, at the court-house in the parish of Morehouse, and that he was appointed by the supervisor of registration as one of the five to be present and see that the polling of votes and counting of the same was done as directed by the law; and he does here declare that he saw nor heard anything to intimidate any man from voting just as he wished. He has never known of any armed or military organizations in the parish of Morehouse during the registration of voters in the said parish or on the day of election. He further declares that he has never known of any colored republicans discharged from labor and employment or the stopping of the issue of rations to colored republicans on account of their being members of the republican party. He further declares that he never knew of any of the roads or approaches to the voting precincts being picketed to prevent republican voters from coming to the polls and from casting their votes according to their own free will.

SAM'L W. REILEY,
Ex-Tax-Collector, Morehouse Parish.

I will now proceed to read the testimony taken in the parish of Natchitoches:

The witness, David Pierson, being first duly sworn by the undersigned authority, did depose and say as follows:

To first interrogatory he answers and says: My name is David Pierson. I reside in the town of Natchitoches, parish of Natchitoches, Louisiana. Am a lawyer by profession.

To second interrogatory he answers and says: I was in Natchitoches Parish the greater part of the time from the 15th September to the 7th November, 1876. Visited almost every ward in the parish during the canvass, and watched closely the conduct both of the registration and election. On the part of the democratic-conservative party there was no intimidation, violence, threats, disturbances, tumults, or other wrongful or ill practices, or frauds concerning said election; no acts, or attempts at acts, to prevent a free, full, fair, and peaceable election. It was the policy of the conservatives, concurred in by the entire rank and file of their party, not only to give no cause of complaint as to the fairness of the election, but to prevent the slightest pretext for a contest so far as the conduct of the democrats was concerned. I attended mass-meetings in various places throughout the parish, which were largely attended by both white and colored citizens, republicans and democrats, and in no instance was there any disturbance or tumult, or other means of intimidation; but, on the contrary, the best of feeling prevailed and freest expression of opinion indulged in. I also attended large republican meetings, at which every democrat, white or colored, demeaned themselves properly and peaceably. Registration offices were opened by the republican supervisor in the various wards of the parish, affording every opportunity to the republicans to obtain their certificates of registration, and in many cases giving preference to the republicans in the location of the offices. There was no disturbance that I am aware of; certainly none complained of at any registration-office in said parish, nor was there any effort on the part of the democrats to hinder, or prevent, or delay registration. If there were any persons who did not register or vote, it was their own fault, so far as the conduct of the conservatives was concerned. In the matter of the election, two out of three commissioners were designated by the supervisor from among the republicans in all the wards that were thought to be republican or to have a republican majority. There was also United States supervisors at each and every poll, as also constables of election. Every precaution provided for in the law, as well as dictated by prudence, was adopted and taken to insure a peaceable and fair election, and the free and voluntary exercise by everybody without regard to race or color or political bias of the right of franchise. I was present at one of the largest polls during the entire day of election, to wit, the polls at Natchitoches, Nos. 1 and 2, of ward 12, at which there was not the slightest ground for complaint against the —— and act of the conservatives; not a broil, disturbance, threat, act of violence, or other wrongful act on the part of the democrats that I know of or heard of. From the close of the polls on the 7th November I was almost constantly about the court house, where the supervisor had his headquarters, and to which place the commissioners brought the boxes and returns for two days; saw the returns of election come in and delivered to this supervisor; heard the commissioners and officers of each poll speak freely of the manner in which the election was conducted at the precincts, and in no instance heard of any complaints against the democrats or that there had been any intimidation, violence, or fraud at any poll. A large crowd of people, white and black, democrats and republicans, were assembled about the supervisor's office at the court-house for two or three days subsequent to the election, and it seemed to be invariably conceded that there had been no cause for protest or complaint, so far as the conduct of the conservatives was concerned. I was present much of the time in which Mr. Russ, the supervisor, was engaged in making up his consolidated statement. He was assisted by the clerks and United States supervisor for the parish, and forwarded the same when completed, without a protest on the part of any one; and I am convinced that had there been any just ground for complaint or protest against the democrats that said officer would have remarked it upon the consolidated statement of votes. On the part of the republicans—colored republicans against colored democrats—there was, as is asserted, a great deal of abuse, threats, and intimidation. From public rumor, information derived from reliable parties throughout the parish, I am constrained to believe that there existed a wide-spread determination among colored republicans of that parish to prevent any colored man from voting the democratic ticket, even if they had to resort to violence to accomplish their designs. In several well defined and atrocious cases, as I am informed and believe, colored men and voters were actually assaulted and greatly injured, even after the election had passed, on account of their having voted the democratic ticket; others were denied religious membership; others ostracized, and others were threatened with death before and after the election.

To the third interrogatory he answers and says: Wards 5 and 6 in said parish, or what is generally known as Hill wards, having a large white population and but few colored. The vote of these wards has been almost solidly democratic at all former elections, the colored voters residing there voting voluntarily with their white neighbors or employers, except a few that reside near the town of Natchitoches, who usually vote at the latter precinct. From my knowledge of the character of the citizens of these wards and the political sentiments of the voters, white and black, the blacks having at every election voted with the democrats, I am satisfied there was a fair, free, and peaceable election in said wards on the 7th November last. Had there been violence or intimidation I should have heard of it. I know of none nor have heard of any; the commissioners of election report none.

To the fourth interrogatory he answers and says: I know of nothing further that I can now call to mind.

D. PIERSON.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this 1st December, 1876.

STATE OF LOUISIANA,
Parish of Natchitoches:

I hereby certify that there has not been filed in the clerk's office of the parish of Natchitoches by the supervisor of registration, any commissioner of election, or any other person, any protest, affidavit, certificate, or statement regarding or relating to any riot, tumults, acts of violence, intimidation, disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences at any place in the parish of Natchitoches, or at or near any poll, or voting-place, or place of registration or revision of registration, preventing or tending to prevent a fair, free, peaceable, and full vote of all the qualified electors of said parish, or any precinct, ward, city, or town in said parish, at the election recently held on the 7th day of November, 1876, or during the registration or the revision of the registration which preceded said election; that I have entire charge of said clerk's office, and I know positively that no said document is or has been on file therein.

Given under my hand and seal of office on the 20th day of November, 1876.

JNO. A. BARLOW,
Deputy Clerk, District Court.

I now go to the parish of Ouachita, the testimony as to which begins of page 773:

STATE OF LOUISIANA,
Parish of Ouachita:

Before me, the undersigned authority, personally appeared John W. Scarborough, who, being duly sworn, deposes under oath that he is a duly registered and qualified voter of the parish of Ouachita, said State; that he voted in said parish, at poll No. 8, ward No. 4, at the recent election, on the 7th day of November, 1876; that the election at said poll was fair, free, and peaceable one, as much so as I have ever seen at any election in my life. I have been living in this State for thirty-nine years, and in the parish of Ouachita nearly all of that time. I was at the poll in ward No. 8 when it was opened, and remained until it closed. I saw republican colored men vote the republican ticket freely, and without any molestation of any kind. I likewise saw numbers of colored men who had heretofore been republicans vote the democratic ticket. They did so freely, and of their own free accord. Many of them had before joined the democratic clubs, organized in my ward and in the Bayou Siard ward. There was no coercion of colored men to join democratic clubs organized in my ward—none whatever. They joined them freely, and of their own accord, in the two wards above referred to, and generally throughout the parish of Ouachita, so far as my knowledge extends. There was no connection between the clubs and the companies formed in the parish for home protection. At a large barbecue given in my ward, about eight days before the election, there was as many as between eighty and ninety colored men joined the club of my ward, residents of the ward. I know this, because I was secretary of the club. We told these colored men not to join our club if they did not intend to vote with us; and they joined the club, expecting and intending to vote the democratic ticket, and the majority of them did so of their own free will. There was no compulsion by any one, and not a disturbance at the poll, and not an angry word spoken that I heard or heard of. The best of feeling prevailed between blacks and whites on that day as previously, and still exists.

This feeling I am satisfied would always exist if not for republican leaders, who seek to utilize the colored voters for their own aggrandizement, and in order to do so inflame their minds to array them against the whites. I am satisfied from their tactics in Ouachita Parish that the leaders would be willing to provoke bloodshed to accomplish their political purposes. It is my firm conviction, and it is the general impression of the white people of my parish, that the programme of the republican leaders was to bring on race conflicts, out of which to make political capital and influence the election. They were jealous of our influence over the colored voters, which was daily growing more potent, and promised to give us a large majority of the votes of the parish. In my own experience I have an instance which I believe to be the result of the teaching or tactics of the republican leaders. While I was quietly riding along the road I was insulted by a negro man who was in a wagon with a number of other negroes. The language was pointed and insulting, and given without any provocation on my part. I have heard of other similar instances in the parish. The conduct of the whites was very forbearing and conciliatory, our object and desire being to have no disturbances or race issues. We were in the minority and wanted no bloodshed or commotions of any kind, and acted and advised in the interest of peace. In the affidavit of Frank B. Johnson, a colored man living in my ward, and who had voluntarily joined our club, I see he swears that "John Scarborough also remarked to me and some other republican voters that if we voted the radical ticket that they would make it so hot for us that we could not live here, and that if we were starving to death he would neither employ or give us a mouthful to eat." I pronounce this a falsehood. I never spoke to him until after he had voted and was standing near a fire in front of the school-house. I knew he had voted the republican ticket by the color of it, and went to where he was standing outside of the house and said to him, in substance, "Frank, I am sorry to see you have gone back on us by voting the republican ticket after having joined the democratic club, as I thought in good faith; and, after deceiving us in this way, so far as I am concerned, I would not employ you or feed you if you were starving."

There could have been no intimidation, as what I said was after he had voted, and at the time there were only three white men present when he voted (also at the time of making my remarks) besides the commissioners of election, and he was himself in company with eight or ten colored men who had voted the republican ticket. I never attempted to intimidate him that day or any time previous, and I scarcely knew him when I saw him. I see also that one J. R. Hall, a white man, states in his affidavit that he was intimidated in my ward when affidavits were being taken as to the character of the election and the freedom of those who voted the democratic ticket. There could be no intimidation after the election, and as to the making of the affidavits, I know of my own knowledge that of all of those taken in my ward are given by colored and white men, freely and voluntarily, and many of them were anxious to give them. I was present when they were being taken and heard nor saw anything to intimidate any one or induce them to give affidavits. I will state further that this man Hall was the justice of the peace before whom the affidavits were taken, and he was requested to state freely to each one the nature of the affidavits desired, and he did so, and they were required to understand fully the nature and purport of what they were signing. They were read to every one of them, and in turn they were asked if they understood them before they were signed. I believe that no one signed without fully understanding what he was signing, and we desired none to sign unless they did know. Some of these colored men who gave their affidavits were indignant at the idea that they were intimidated to vote the democratic ticket. I will state further that this man Hall stated publicly, after the nomination of republican State ticket, that he would not support it, and subsequently joined the democratic club of my ward.

This same affiant states that on Saturday previous to the election he went to Monroe, and on his return saw Captain McLeod employing his men to picket the road leading to Monroe. I will state of my own knowledge that no pickets were stationed on the roads on Saturday. There were pickets placed on the roads on Sunday, and this was done, as I know, at the request of leading citizens to prevent armed bodies of men from visiting Monroe to create disturbance, which was anticipated, and that the picketing was done entirely in the interest of peace and good order, and no unarmed man was prevented from going to town. The reasons for apprehending trouble by armed colored men visiting Monroe was the fact that reliable information had been obtained to the effect that the leading republicans had advised the colored men to go to Monroe days before the election from all parts of the parish, and the rumors were that they were to go there armed; subsequently to this a number of arms were found secreted in two different places in the town of Monroe, and which I have every reason to believe were placed there for the use of colored men. None of this picketing was done with the view of intimidation or for purposes of preventing a free and fair election, but solely, as I know, in the interest of peace and order. This same affiant (Hall) further states that a leading republican was afraid to vote at poll 8, and did not, and that it was because two democrats were keeping a tally-sheet near the polling-places. This was done by the democratic party for ascertaining the vote of each poll in advance of the count of the commissioners, and this they knew from the color of the tickets deposited by each voter in the boxes. It was never intended to intimidate any voter, nor did it have any such effect, so far as my personal knowledge extends. There was but one republican at that poll who did not vote, and he was told repeatedly by the best citizens he ought to vote, and that he could not say that he was intimidated, for he was at perfect liberty to vote just as he pleased. Numbers of others had voted the republican ticket at this poll, and there was nothing to prevent or deter him from doing so had he desired it, but his reply was that he had left his registration-papers at home. I positively assert that this man was not intimidated or hindered in the right of suffrage, and no other man on that day, notwithstanding this affiant swears "the like influence kept many republicans from voting."

In regard to the guns which same affiant (Hall) says were brought into the room soon after the closing of the polls, I will state that the commissioners of election requested a special deputy sheriff who was present to get some three or four citizens to go home and get their guns and escort the commissioners with the boxes to Monroe. Several volunteered to do so, who procured their guns and came in for that purpose, and did go with them, or at least I saw them start on the way. I will state further, that there was not a gun on the ground that day, except those brought there under the circumstances above stated, and not a pistol, that I saw. As an evidence that there was no intimidation, I will further state that Judge Baker, who is a republican, was at the poll during the day and freely moved about among the voters electioneering for republicans as we were for the democratic ticket, and as the result many republican tickets were polled. The same affiant mentions the shooting and killing of various colored republicans, and among them the shooting of H. W. Burwell, Spencer Dickerson, and William Lewis, and makes them appear as political; I will state the man who did the shooting, whose name is Hathaway, came to my plantation a short time previous, and one of the lessors on the place hired him to pick cotton. On Saturday, the day of the shooting, he went to Monroe and received pay for the cotton he had picked and got crazy drunk, as is well known, and on his way home, in a wagon with the party who was employing him, he did the wanton and vicious shooting, which was done indiscriminately, and the result was the wounding of these three colored men. Two of these colored men were noted democrats, to wit, Spencer Dickerson and William Lewis. The shooting had no political significance whatever, as it is well known to the affiant Hall and every one else cognizant of the facts. A member of our club who had been to town and heard the facts came and reported the same to the club, which was at the time holding its meeting, and the entire club immediately dispersed to their homes, procured their guns, and went in pursuit of Hathaway. He saw us approaching in the dusk of the evening and made his escape to the woods. We picketed the roads and surrounded the place where we supposed he was secreted and remained all night, and the next day about twelve o'clock we succeeded in capturing him in a dense thicket, after having sent for more men to assist us. We conducted him to Monroe and delivered him to sheriff of the parish, and he is now securely lodged in jail. On the way to town the negroes on the plantations shouted "five hundred votes for the democrats," and otherwise applauded our actions.

All these facts are likewise well known to the affiant Hall, as I am aware, notwithstanding his overlooking them in his zeal to work up acts of intimidation and violence for political effect. Since the election I have repeatedly heard the affiant Hall say that the election was quiet, peaceable, free, and fair, and that he had voted the ticket of his choice without intimidation of any sort. He stated this just before leaving Ouachita Parish to come to New Orleans. In regard to the various affidavits made in relation to the killing of republicans in Ouachita Parish, I will state that none of them were, as far as I know, the result of political principles or for political purposes. It is well known by the best citizens of my parish, as well as myself, that B. H. Dinkgrave had many personal enemies, and some very bitter, and of which fact he was himself well aware. Some years previous to his death he had killed one John C. Winnberly, and his family always considered it an unwarrantable killing, and Dinkgrave himself was uneasy in regard to the matter. Citizens have heard him say that he was apprehensive that he might be hurt in consequence of it; and this was the general impression in the community. I have no idea that his death had anything to do with politics, and our citizens are generally of this impression, except those anxious to make political capital out of his death. In regard to James Jackson, who was killed on his wagon loaded with wood, referred to in affidavits as a political matter, it is a well-conceded fact that he was killed in consequence of a family matter in a difficulty, or as a result of a difficulty, with another colored man, and no one in the community ever charged this death to politics. I am a planter in the parish of Ouachita, of long residence, and well known; my relations with the colored people have been of the kindliest character, and my counsel and efforts have been in the interest of peace and good order.

First Justice of the Peace for the Parish of Orleans.

MONROE, 17th November, A. D. 1876.

STATE OF LOUISIANA,
Parish of Ouachita:

I, Julius Ennemoser, clerk of the fourteenth judicial district court in and for said parish and State, do hereby certify that under the twenty-sixth section of the act of the General Assembly of Louisiana, numbered 98, and approved 20th November, 1872, and published on page 15 of the acts of the General Assembly of Louisiana for 1873, and entitled 'An act to regulate the conduct and to maintain the freedom and purity of elections; to prescribe the mode of making returns thereof; to provide for the election of returning officers and defining their powers and duties; to prescribe the mode of entering on the rolls of the senate and house of representatives, and to enforce article 103 of the constitution;" which said section 26 of said act is as follows.

Having already once read the twenty-sixth section of the act, it need not be here repeated.

Neither the supervisor of registration of said parish of Ouachita nor of any election held in said parish on Tuesday, the 7th of November, A. D. 1876, for presidential electors, State, parish, and ward officers, member of Congress fifth congressional district, State senator eighteenth senatorial district, members of the State house of representatives, and district judge and district attorney for the fourteenth judicial district, has filed or caused to be filed with me, or in my office, any sworn or other statement, as required by said section 26, in the manner therein provided, that there was any riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, and disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences, at any place within said parish, or at any or near any poll or voting place, or place of registration, or revision of registration, or that any such act or acts prevented a fair, free, peaceable, and full registration and election, or that any qualified elector of said parish was deterred from registering or voting.

Witness my official signature and seal of office this 17th day of November, A. D. 1876.

[SEAL.] JULIUS ENNEMOSER,
Clerk of the Fourteenth Judicial District Court, Parish of Ouachita.

STATE OF LOUISIANA,
Parish of Orleans:

Before me personally came Charles Tidwell, who, being sworn, deposes and says he is sixty-one years old; plants on the island in Ouachita. He moved there from Wilcox County, Alabama, in 1872. I know the woman Eliza Pinkston, she, with the exception of two years, having lived with me ever since she was a child. She has always been a bad girl and woman; she has been in trouble ever since I knew her, and when I left Alabama I had to leave her because she was in jail for some misconduct. She has never had a regular husband, but has had several children. Her first child she threw away in a patch of briers when it was an infant; it was lost about twenty-four hours, when she said somebody had stolen it, when some one found it where she placed it; said child is now on my place, and is about ten years old. Her second child, it has always been said, was destroyed by her at or about its birth; it disappeared mysteriously at any rate. She came out to Louisiana with some hands of Colonel Morrison's, and in all was about two years away from me. While on Morrison's place in Morehouse, she was prosecuted for a violent assault and battery on an old colored woman; she was acquitted for want of witness, but afterward the old woman died from the injuries. She told me herself that she had beaten her and smothered her. She came back to my place about 1st August, 1875, from Morehouse. She picked cotton on my place last season, and when she went off an old colored woman called "Aunt Rose," between sixty and seventy years of age, went with her to a mill out in Union Parish. The old woman got bedridden, and it has been rumored commonly through the country that the old woman was beaten to death by Eliza, though I will do her the justice to say that she denied it to me when I charged her with it.

Eliza is one of the most turbulent, cruel, vindictive creatures I ever saw. She is terribly obscene and vulgar in her talk—say profane—and curses worse than any one I ever saw in any matter she had any feeling in. I know no one else who knows her well would believe a word she said; she is a notorious liar. She took up some time since with a man named Henry Pinkston, the one who was killed on my place on the night of 4th November, 1876. About 1st of August she came with Henry to my place to pick cotton. He had recently before had a terrible fight with one Aleck Brooks, at Ouachita City, where Brooks was crippled by him, one hand being partially disabled. It was notorious through the country, for it was said to be a terrible fight. Henry and Eliza picked cotton for me this fall, and this man Brooks, also. Eliza and Brooks got into a quarrel in the field, and Henry was brought into it, but nothing serious there occurred, Brooks saying, as I learned at the time, that he would not fight Henry a fair fight, but would fix him yet. Eliza knew that I knew these things, and all about her. On Friday before the election there was a radical meeting at Saint James chapel, near my place, and Eliza and Henry were there. She got terribly excited over the speech of a colored man—cursed and abused him out loud, and begged for a pistol, saying she "would shoot the damned son of a bitch out of the wagon if anybody would give her a pistol." Henry, so far, as I know, was not an active partisan. On the morning of the 5th of November, (Sunday,) I was awakened about five in the morning by Eliza knocking at my door. She stated she had been shot and Henry killed. She lived about three-fourths of a mile from my house. I got up, and she then told me that Brooks and his crowd had been to her house and killed Henry and nearly killed her. I told her as soon as it was light I would go down and see about it. After talking a little while, she said to me if it was not Brooks's gang she knew it was the radical negroes on the Boher and Pace places, and some from over the river. Mr. Harald, (John,) who lives in the house with me, heard these facts of these statements. When the second was made no one was present but myself. The afternoon of the same day she again said, in my presence and that of Sire Packs and E. J. Armstrong, that there were fifteen or twenty men came there, but she did not know any of them.

I sent for Dr. Helmich and had her wounds attended to; she was up pretty much all the time after the wounding, going about readily whenever she pleased.

A little negro on my place found the body of the child in the lake, about one hundred and fifty paces from the house she occupied, two or three days after Henry's death. I, being notified, went down; took the body out of the water; there was no wounds upon it, and it evidently had been drowned.

I went down to Monroe on Monday the 6th, and I reported the whole matter to the coroner. I buried the body, but the coroner did not come; I mean Henry's body. It is not a fact that the body was mutilated in any other manner than the shots through the head and body. Mr. William Packs, one of the persons charged by Eliza with killing Henry and wounding her, died and was buried, to my personal knowledge, about the 1st of September last.

I have no idea that Eliza ever saw James Logan in her life. I know Eliza well and her character for truth and veracity, and do not hesitate to say that she is utterly unworthy of credit in any statement she makes, whether under oath or otherwise.

STATE OF LOUISIANA,
Parish of Orleans:

Personally appeared Fr. Endom, who, being duly sworn, deposes under oath that he is a duly registered and qualified voter of the parish of Ouachita. I am mayor of the city of Monroe, and for the last two years and six months; been living in Monroe for the last eighteen years. Knew Dr. B. H. Dinkgrave personally, and in my opinion he was not killed on account of his politics; some five or six years ago he shot and killed a man by the name of John Winnberly. Said Winnberly had brothers living in Ouachita Parish and in Texas. He also arrested a party from Richland Parish some years ago, by the name of Adams, on the affidavit of a negro woman, charging said Adams with the killing of Judge Crawford and Arthur Harris on their way from Columbia to Winnsborough. Adams was discharged afterward, but swore vengeance against Dinkgrave. The killing of James Jackson, who came one morning in the outskirts of the city limits lying dead on his wagon loaded with wood, was attributed to some family quarrels. Information I received that same morning that he, having left a wife on one place and married another who had grown sons, who did not approve of said marriage; that he did not treat his wife to the satisfaction of her sons. Further reports were he sold his wood too cheap, and the other colored settlers in his neighborhood were dissatisfied with him on that account; that no positive proof was obtained. As soon as notified I went to the spot where the ox-team and loaded wagon had stopped. I found the body lying on the top of the wagon. I immediately dispatched mounted police to the spot where the deed was reported to have been committed, in search of the party who was suspected of committing the deed, but they returned after some time without arresting any person.

The clubs of the democratic party and rifle companies were two distinct organizations. I did belong to the democratic club, but was not a member of the rifle club in the city of Monroe or any other portion of the parish.

The companies were organized, as I understand, for the preservation of peace and good order of the city of Monroe and the parish.

The day after the killing of Dr. Dinkgrave news came to the city of Monroe that a large body of armed negroes from the island and the parish of Morehouse were coming to plunder and burn the city. Immediate alarm was given and a large number of white citizens went to the island in order to check the movements of the negroes and keep them from coming to the city of Monroe.

It was reported that an order had been issued to the negroes through the country for them to come to the city of Monroe armed. This order was said to have been issued by one George B. Hamlet, negro sheriff of the parish of Ouachita and candidate for State senator for the parishes of Ouachita and Caldwell.

No republican meeting ever held in the city of Monroe has ever been interfered with by the democratic citizens of Monroe.

About the same time reports came in that houses of white citizens down the river had been shot into at night by negroes. I then myself, in company with Judge R. W. Richardson and F. P. Stubbs, called upon Judge Robert Ray, a leading republican in our parish, and requested him to go at once and investigate the shooting into the houses of the white citizens above referred to, and induce the negroes to abstain from their unlawful acts, thereby preventing a collision between the races and bring the guilty parties to justice.

He readily and willingly complied with our request, thereby restoring peace and good order in that section of the parish.

About ten days after the election, news came to me from several parties that a large number of fire-arms were collected and secreted within the corporate limits of the city of Monroe by negroes, but I did not pay much attention to the report; that in order to satisfy myself on the subject I went to see Mr. Ennemoser and inquired of him if he knew anything about the fire-arms reported to be secreted in the city, which he denied to me of knowing anything about, and I rested easy on the subject until the Sunday before the election a considerable number of armed and unarmed negroes came within the city limits, and congregated at the house of one Anthony Overton, which movement on their part created considerable excitement in the city among the residents. I was myself out that night with about twenty special policemen, and watched their movements. About two o'clock in the morning I came across about fifteen armed men, (negroes,) having posted themselves on the open road, within the corporate limits of the city. I asked what their demonstration meant. They told me that it was reported to them that this was to be their last night. I asked them for their author, but they refused to give any. I told them to go to their houses, and I would see that none of them would be harmed. I was out the whole night myself, and I saw nothing to justify their movements.

On the following day I issued a proclamation, annexed in my other affidavit, ordering all armed bodies to disperse and go home. Copies of my proclamation were distributed among all the citizens of Monroe, white and colored. About noon of the same day, a negro by the name of ——, with Harrison Bell, handed me on the street of the city of Monroe five of my proclamations written on the back of them, "Hell and damnation, we want no peace," with threatening language written on the back also. In order to prevent riot and bloodshed, I went to the house of Anthony Overton to learn, if I could, who had written the insulting language on the back of the proclamations, but did not learn from him or any of the others present at his house who did the writing.

I then read aloud to the negroes present, several hundred in number, my proclamation. A good many of them obeyed the proclamation, and a large number of them paid no attention to it, and were then requested by George B. Hamlet to stay and not obey the proclamation. I did not hear him tell them so, but was informed that he did so.

My proclamation was not issued for any political purpose, but to preserve the peace and good order of the city of Monroe.

Seeing that the armed bodies of men would not disperse after having notice and time to do so, I called upon Lieutenant-Colonel Hale, commanding United States troops at Monroe, and requested him to accompany me to Monroe to assist me in making search for the arms and assist me in preserving the peace, which request he readily complied with. After searching several houses, reports came to me where the arms were concealed. Myself and Colonel Hale went to the spot, to wit, the house of one Virald Moore, on whose premises we found a number of fire-arms concealed in outhouses and covered up by matting and old lumber. Said fire-arms were taken possession of by Colonel Hale, at my request, and a guard placed over them by him. The guns were returned to the owners (negroes) the day after the election. Since my arrival here in this city I received information from home that another lot of arms, to wit, one hundred and ten guns, were found on the same premises, concealed in an empty cistern, which, in my belief, were to be used to intimidate the democratic voters of Monroe, white and colored, as threats of violence had been reported to me to that effect as coming from the parties in possession of said arms, notwithstanding the night before the election had passed off peaceably and quietly.

On the day of election there was perfect peace and quiet in the city of Monroe, with the exception of one colored man arrested for having on his person a pistol, I having made ample provisions to preserve the peace by appointing a large number of special policemen, which enabled me to preserve the peace and order of the day. I appointed none but democrats on my police from the fact that the United States deputy marshals and deputy sheriffs were all republicans, and most of them were unreliable and objectionable to all good, law-abiding citizens.

I further state that all citizens who conducted themselves with propriety were equally respected in our parish, regardless of their political affiliations and sentiments.

Mr. President, I will read now the testimony from the parish of Tangipahoa, beginning on page 977:

STATE OF LOUISIANA,

Parish of Tangipahoa, Sixth Judicial District Court:

I, Dan. T. Setton, chief deputy clerk of the sixth judicial district court of the parish of Tangipahoa, State of Louisiana, (N. A. Sanders, clerk, being absent on account of sickness in family,) do hereby certify that there has been no protest whatsoever filed up to date in my office, under act 98, section 26 of the acts of 1872, for any reasons or causes whatsoever mentioned in said section 26.

Sworn under my official signature and the impress of my seal of office, this the 23d day of November, 1876.

DAN. T. SETTON,

Chief Deputy Clerk of the Sixth Judicial District Court of Louisiana, Parish of Tangipahoa.

I will now read from the testimony from the parish of Claiborne, page 271:

Answers of J. S. Young to cross-interrogatories.

First cross-interrogatory. I was frequently out of the ward in which I resided, and in various parts of the parish at times, for some time prior to the 7th of November last, and visited the Hainsville ward, which is ward 3, the Summerville ward, which is ward 1. I did not know or hear of any merchants in Homer stating that they would not furnish provisions or supplies to such colored men as voted the republican ticket at the general election. Such expressions may have been used; but, if so, they were undoubtedly the exception and not the rule.

Second cross-interrogatory. There never was, at any time during the canvass, any democratic rifle-clubs. There were democratic clubs, but they never held secret meetings, nor had they any arms whatever, nor did they contemplate anything except the most peaceable persuasion, by reason and argument. It was from the beginning the earnest purpose of the democratic leaders, in truth and in fact, to have nothing of a nature to force or intimidate any one.

J. S. YOUNG.

Answers of R. R. Morgan to interrogatories propounded by candidates of the democratic party.

Answer to interrogatory 1. My name is R. R. Morgan; am forty-seven years old, and reside in the parish of Claiborne.

Answer to interrogatory 2. Was in Homer, Claiborne Parish, on the day of the last election, and had resided in said parish for the year previous and for five years.

Answer to interrogatory 3. I do know the character of the election in my parish, and the same was quiet and peaceable and fair.

Answer to interrogatory 4. There was no disturbance, tumult, bribing, or intimidation that day.

Answer to interrogatory 5. The condition of my parish previous to the election and during the campaign was quiet and peaceable.

Answer to interrogatory 6. I know of no bull-dozers or any kindred organization in my parish.

Answer to interrogatory 7. The republican party during the campaign had lost its leading white men by their going over to the democracy, and had no head or leadership.

Answer to interrogatory 8. The relations of whites and blacks toward each other in that parish have been amicable and peaceable.

Answer to interrogatory 9. I am satisfied that as many colored men voted the democratic ticket as did the republican, if not more, and that without any improper influences.

Answer to interrogatory 10. All the republicans that I have heard speak of the election there have invariably admitted that it was fair.

Answer to interrogatory 11. I know nothing of the arrest of Osberry Billiord or Willis Walker.

R. R. MORGAN.

Sworn to and acknowledged before me, at New Orleans, the 30th November, 1876.

EMMET D. CRAIG,

Commissioner United States Circuit Court, District of Louisiana.

Answers of J. S. Young to interrogatories for democratic-conservative candidates.

Answer 1. My name is J. S. Young; am fifty-two years old, and reside in the parish of Claiborne, and have for over twenty years.

Answer 2. I was in Homer, said parish, on the day of November 7, being the day of the last general election in the State of Louisiana, and had been for thirty years previous living in said parish, and have traversed the parish generally during that time.

Answer 3. I do know the character of the election in said parish; it was fair, quiet, and peaceable.

Answer 4. There was no disturbance, nor tumults, intimidation, nor bribery that affiant knew or heard of on the day of the election, nor at any time previous during the supervision of registration.

Answer 5. The condition of Claiborne Parish during the campaign was undoubtedly peaceable, and the canvass was conducted with the most gratifying feelings between both political parties, so much so that never during twenty years' experience there have I seen a canvass or an election in which the feeling was more amicable. So far as I know, saw, or heard, any voter could have voted or spoken without insult or molestation during the canvass. Indeed such was the fair and amicable manner in which the canvass was conducted, that Mr. Packard, Colonel Wharton, and General H. J. Campbell all expressed themselves gratified, when they entered the canvass, at the perfect good feeling and fairness that was apparent, and articles to that effect appeared in the New Orleans Republican, when giving account of the progress of the canvass.

Answer 6. I know of no such organization as bull-dozers, or regulators, or any such kind of organizations having any existence in said parish during the entire canvass, nor indeed at any time whatever, and I am satisfied I should have known it if any such organization existed.

Answer 7. The republican party during the campaign was in a disorganized condition. W. I. Blackburn, its main leader, had declared he would not support the ticket, because he wanted honest and economical government, and his paper, which was the official organ of that party, took open ground to that effect, and Blackburn himself made speeches to the same effect to several large assemblies. The other leading republicans there, almost without exception, took the same ground. So completely was this disorganized condition prevalent that the colored men there, fully one-third if not one-half of them, voluntarily took part in the preliminary election of the democratic party some months prior to the general election, and identified themselves fully with the democratic party; this, too, when there was no excitement as to party candidates, and when, in order to come forward and participate, every one had to pledge himself, or consider himself pledged, to support the nominees. The relations of white and colored voters, and of the two races generally, are of the most amicable kind in said parish.

Answer 9. I am satisfied, from what I saw and heard, that more colored men voted the democratic ticket than the republican, and so far as I know, did so freely and without any improper influence.

Answer 10. I have heard many colored men expressing themselves as highly pleased that they could say that they voted the republican ticket as freely as the democratic, and that they had done so; and I also heard white republicans say things to the same effect. The supervisor of registration himself, I. E. Scott, used expressions of satisfaction that all things had gone so fair, and probably both before and since the election.

Answer 11. I was present at the polls acting as deputy United States supervisor when Asberry Billiard and Willis Walker were arrested on the day of election, and in each case, upon consultations with I. E. Scott, supervisor of registration, and being convinced that, though attempting to vote upon the original registration-papers when duplicates had been issued to them, that they intended no fraud, I had them released after only a few minutes' confinement, and they had every opportunity to vote as they pleased, and I am satisfied they could not have been intimidated, for the exact state of the case was kindly explained to them both. In conclusion I will merely state that no fairer election was ever held in Claiborne Parish, nor ever will be; and I am satisfied that nine-tenths of the republicans in that parish would freely testify to the same state of facts. There is no ostracism or bitterness there as a rule against any one, white or black, simply because he may be a republican.

I will now read the testimony from the parish of Bossier, page 235:

To F. A. WOOLFLEY, Esq.,

Chief Supervisor of Election for District of Louisiana:

The undersigned, appointed United States supervisor of election for the parish of Bossier, submits the following report in regard to the election held on the 7th instant. The undersigned was at Bellevue, the parish site, on day of election, and saw no disorder of any character, except some boisterous demonstrations by large squads of colored voters as they rode into town. So far as I have been able to learn, there was no violence at any of the polls in the parish; but I have heard that there was considerable intimidation by threats made by colored republicans against persons of their own race and color, whom the former thought were inclined to vote any other than the straight republican ticket, and I believe the information imparted to me on the subject to be true. The returns and boxes from all the polling-places in the parish, except poll 3, (Red Land,) were received after the time prescribed by law, and the returns were in many respects irregular. Some of the returns were not signed or sworn to by the commissioners, nor were the boxes and returns delivered by the commissioners.

I have also been informed and believe that these irregularities were known to T. H. Hutton, State supervisor for this parish, and that he was requested to note them upon his consolidated returns under the head of remarks, and he refused to do so except as to one polling-place, at which there was a democratic majority. I further state that said Hutton told me that he would not complete his returns until the 17th instant, and that he completed them this day, and left town before I could get to speak to him upon my coming to town from my home, six miles distant.

W. G. BURT,
United States Supervisor for Bossier Parish.

STATE OF LOUISIANA,
Parish of Bossier:

Before the undersigned, legal authorities, this day personally appeared G. B. Abercrombie, who, after being sworn, states: I am clerk of the district court for the Bossier Parish, and have been continuously since before the late election; that there are three ballot-boxes, namely: box from ward 2, Benton; box from ward 8, Canes's Landing; and box from ward 5, Niner's school-house, that did not come into my possession, as clerk of the district court, until Friday, the 10th of November, 1876, after the election on Tuesday; that on Friday the 10th instant, B. F. Fort brought and handed me the box from ward 2, Benton, about 10 o'clock a. m., without the key to the same. The tally-sheet, poll-book, and official list of voters he handed me loosely, rolled together. Fort came from his residence with the box; no one else was with Fort when he brought me the box. The box from ward 8, Canes s Landing, was handed me by A. J. Smith, who was not a commissioner. The box from ward 5 I receipted for to T. D. Williams. All this was on Friday. In no case did more than one person come with the box.

STATE OF LOUISIANA,
Parish of Richland:

Personally appeared before me, the undersigned justice of the peace, in and for the fourth ward of the parish of Richland, and State of Louisiana George Harrison, a colored voter of said parish, who testifies that prior to the election of 1876 that he has always voted republican; that during the fall of 1876 he joined the democratic club at Alto, Louisiana, and that he of his own free will voted the democratic ticket openly and above board; that on Monday night, before the election, Mr. Frank Mose, candidate for clerk of the district court, together with eight or ten other men, all of whom I think were colored men, and called me out and endeavored to get me to vote the republican ticket. This was the only crowd of men that I saw passing through the country on said night; and that on the next I proceeded quietly to Alto, voted the democratic ticket, together with some hundred other colored voters, all of whom exercised free and unobstructed recess to either ticket they pleased; that I heard Mr. H. F. Vickers call upon colored voters to come up and vote, that he would protect any colored man in voting the republican or democratic ticket, and requested them to use their choice.

PARISH OF LIVINGSTON.
State of Louisiana:

NOVEMBER 8, 1876.

I the undersigned, deputy United States marshal in and for the parish aforesaid, do hereby certify that I was in attendance at poll No. 4, in said parish, during the whole day of election, November 7, 1876, and that everything was conducted in a quiet and orderly manner and with strict accordance with law, and that there was no riot or disturbance of any kind; that there was no intimidation or attempt to intimidate, of any voter, and that every one was allowed to vote according to their own inclination

URSIN DESOUNGE,
United States Deputy Marshal.

STATE OF LOUISIANA } Murder.
vs.
ALEXANDER W. KINCHER. }

The above case was transferred from Livingston Parish to the first district court, parish of Orleans, and on May 14, 1874, was transferred from the first district court to the superior criminal court, parish of Orleans. Order and motion transferring papers to the parish of Livington, March 5, 1875.

I certify the above to be true and correct.

JOHN FITZPATRICK,
Clerk Superior Criminal Court for the Parish of Orleans.

OCTOBER 17, 1876.

I read this certificate from the clerk of this parish to show that this man Kincher is now under indictment for murder, and it was upon his affidavit that the entire vote for the parish was thrown out. I doubt if he is worse than most of the other witnesses. I have not time to comment.

STATE OF LOUISIANA.
Parish of Orleans:

In the matter of contest for the parish of Livingston.

W. DUNCAN, being sworn, says, in answer to interrogatory 1:

I reside in Amite City, parish of Tangipahoa; my age is forty-two years; my occupation an attorney at law.

To the second interrogatory. I was in the parish of Livingston about three weeks before the election; went nearly all over it. Was in every ward in the parish except two, and talked with people in every ward, both white and colored; and, from what I saw and heard, believe the election has been free, fair, and peaceable. Heard of no disturbance, intimidation, threat, or violence of any kind on account of political opinions. Every one seemed to express their political opinions freely and publicly. Some democrats were voting for republican candidates and some republicans were voting for democratic candidates, and, from my observation and from what I could learn, I was satisfied that Livingston Parish would give a large majority for the democratic party.

Answer to third interrogatory. The condition of the parish previous to the election, and for the past fifteen or twenty years, was peaceable and quiet. The people, as a general thing, are good citizens, and law-abiding, orderly, and well behaved, honest, and industrious. Know nothing of political trickery. I lived in the perish for twenty-five years, and am well acquainted with the people, and live now in Tangipahoa, the adjoining parish. Livingston has always given a large democratic majority; in fact, it was once called the land of democracy.

STATE OF LOUISIANA,

I hereby certify that no protests under article 26, election law, No. 98, of 1872, have been filed in my office by any party up to this 20th day of November, A. D. 1876.

[SEAL.] F. M. TURNER,
Clerk of District Court, Eighteenth Judicial District, Webster Parish, Louisiana.

Personally came and appeared before me W. B. Morrow, who, after being duly sworn, testifies and states as follows: I am a brother of J. T. Morrow, supervisor of registration for Webster Parish, and live in the same house with him. On 9th November, 1876, two days after the election, my said brother, J. T. Morrow, and G. W. Morrow, (also my brother, and candidate for recorder,) requested me to use my influence with prominent democrats to obtain their consent to the following proposition: That J. T. Morrow, as supervisor of registration, would sign the election returns as compiled by clerk of court and United States Supervisor W. D. McDonald, provided he be permitted to change the figures only so as to show that G. W. Morrow was elected recorder. I saw leading democrats, as requested, on same day, but met with no encouragement. On evening of 10th November I was sent by my two brothers aforesaid to Mr. T. B. Neal to solicit him to use his influence to secure the consent of prominent democrats to the above proposition. Mr. Neal told me that he would consent to consider the proposition, and requested me to bring it in writing from my brothers, J. T. and G. W. Morrow. I delivered Mr. Neal's message to them. They declined to commit this proposition to writing, but again sent me to Mr. Neal, requesting further a personal interview. Mr. Neal consented, and went out of the back door of his store with me, and I carried him to the back of Captain Ben. Wade's store, where my two brothers above mentioned were waiting. I left the three in consultation. Did not hear any of their conversation.

STATE OF LOUISIANA,
Parish of Catahoula:

Personally came and appeared before me, R. E. Yancey, a registered voter residing in ward 12, being duly sworn, deposes and says that he was United States supervisor for poll No. 12, Catahoula Parish, at the general election, November 7, 1876; that he was present at poll No. 12 from the opening of the polls till the close of the polls at the general election held November 7, 1876; that all was fair, free, and peaceable at said poll; that there was no intimidation, threats, or bribery used at or around said poll to influence voters. Deponent further says that he was present and witnessed the counting of the ballots, the keeping of the tally-sheets, till the box was locked and sealed; that the tickets were called off, the tallies were kept only by regularly authorized commissioners. Deponent further says that the campaign by the democrats and conservatives in Catahoula Parish was free from intimidation, &c., so far as he knows.

Before me, the undersigned authority, personally came and appeared Frank Johnson, a colored man, who, after having been duly sworn, says: That he is a citizen of the parish of Catahoula, in said State; that he was vice-president of the democratic club of said parish called "wide-awake;" that he, with his club, consisting of thirty members, all colored, voted the democratic-conservative ticket, State and national, at the election held on the 7th instant; that there was a very large colored club at Harrisonburgh, in said parish, which he visited, and that he has been informed and believes its members voted the straight democratic ticket; that he is satisfied that one hundred and fifty colored men in the parish aforesaid voted that ticket.

Affiant further says that the colored men voting the democratic ticket did so freely; that he has no knowledge of any intimidation having been practiced or attempted by white or colored democrats toward colored or white republicans; that the colored democrats were intimidated in every way possible; he was the pastor of the colored Baptist missionary church on Little River, and as soon as he joined the democratic club and expressed his determination to vote the democratic ticket he was turned out of his church; that the republican party managers of that parish sent messengers around to the colored people about a month before the election, and got up as many of the colored voters' certificates of registration as they could, and held them until just before the election; during the interval many of those persons informed affiant that they wanted to join his club, and would do so but for fear if they did they would lose their certificates that were in the hands of the republicans.

Affiant further states that the women of his race were advised by leading republicans to abandon their husbands if they voted the democratic ticket, and many of them threatened to do so.

Before me, the undersigned authority, personally came and appeared Frank A. Jones, of this parish, to me well known, who, after having been by me duly sworn, deposes and says that he is a registered voter of said parish and State, and resides in ward No. 8 of the parish of Catahoula; that he was present at the polling-place established in said ward, on the 7th day of November, 1876, and remained at said polling-place from about seven o'clock a. m. until the close of the poll; that during the said time, namely, from seven o'clock in the morning until the close of the polls, the conduct of the colored republicans present was violent in the extreme, and such as to intimidate any timid colored man from voting anything except a republican ticket; that threats were loudly made against any colored democrat, first, of social ostracism, and secondly, of expulsion from all religious societies, and the effect of such threats and intimidation was, as affiant believes, to prevent many colored men from voting the democratic ticket, as they had previously expressed their determination to do. Affiant further declares that one of the officers of said ward, namely, Miley White, constable, was loudest in his threats and denunciations of those who voted the democratic ticket.

Affiant further testifies that, after the closing of the polls, the votes were not called out by any commissioner of election, and a part of the time while the votes were being counted no commissioners at all were present, and they were, as affiant believes, in bed and asleep.

STATE OF LOUISIANA,

Personally appeared Charles A. Price, who, being duly sworn, deposes under oath that he lives in the parish of Saint Charles, Louisiana; that his rights as a voter under the law have been interfered with, in casting his vote according to his own free will, in the following manner and under the circumstances and by the persons whose names are hereinafter set forth; that affiant lives in the parish of Saint Charles for three years past; is a laborer; that during the last canvass in this parish affiant had made up his mind and declared his intentions to support the democratic ticket in part; that at a meeting of the colored club in his ward affiant was requested to address the club by a vote of the members present; that, because he expressed political views contrary to the opinions of some present, some of them, led on by Jerry Thornton and Clem Collin, two candidates (colored) on the republican ticket and at that time holding the offices of justice of the peace and coroner, forcibly dragged affiant from the speaker's stand, and a row was only prevented by the tax-collector taking affiant away from the mob, who were incensed against him for being a democrat and taking part with democrats; that a short time afterward there was a republican mass-meeting at Hahnville, which I attended; while there I was attacked by Jerry Thornton and Clem Collin above mentioned, surrounded by their friends, and horsewhipped in the public streets, denounced as a damned democratic son of a bitch; escaping from the crowd, I mounted my horse and rode off toward home; Thornton and Collins, coming soon after in pursuit, overtook me at the place of Mr. Louis Ransom. Jerry Thornton rode in the yard after me, but was ordered out by Mr. Norbert Ransom. Both Thornton and Collon then waited outside for me, saying that I had better sleep there if I wanted to keep safe from them, that they intended to fix me, or drive me out of the parish on account of politics. After waiting some time I determined to make an attempt to reach home, and rode off. After going a little distance the two rode up, one on each side, and one put a pistol to my head while the other whipped me with a horsewhip. I tried to ride away from them, but one of them held my bridle and continued to beat and threaten me for about two miles, until they were tired. I could make no resistance, as they were armed and I was not. When they left me they told me that they would either make a good sound republican out of me or drive me out of the parish.

As a consequence of this treatment, and being in daily fear of their threats, I neither voted nor registered, and took no further part in politics. Up to that time I had a strong support in my ward among the colored people, but they were demoralized and frightened off by what had happened, and either took no part or else voted the republican ticket.

[SEAL.] G. ESPINOLA,
Clerk of Court.

I have read, Mr. President, as much of this testimony as I deem it necessary on this occasion. I think I have read enough to show that the action of the returning board was not only not authorized, because the returns of statements of the fact of intimidation were not made so as to give it jurisdiction, but even if it had jurisdiction the evidence is ample to establish the fact that the election had been fair and free, and without any of the acts of violence enumerated in the law; yet, sir, on this condition of facts before that board, it rejected votes enough to wipe out a majority of 8,957 given to the Tilden electors and to give to the Hayes electors an apparent majority of 4,712, a change of upward of 13,000 votes. This is a most startling fact, and one which should not be overlooked by the people of the United States. Here is where I say this question is no longer of a local character, but truly national. Can it be that the people of this country will submit to such a degrading and humiliating attempt not only to deprive the people of Louisiana of their votes, but to impose on the nation a President not elected?

I ask, will the people submit to this? If they do, we may say farewell to all free elections in this country. This would be but the beginning, and no one can tell where the end will be. Our safety no less than our duty is to prevent this infamous attempt. In addition to this, it is due to the people of Louisiana that they should be vindicated. For years they have been held up before the country as assassins and murderers and violators of law in every way, when, in fact, these people have patiently borne the most horrid system of oppression ever inflicted on any people. The oppression of Poland by Russia is nothing to what has been imposed on them. The history of the world, in my estimation, nowhere affords a parallel to it. For this vile oppression had no limit, it reached everywhere and to everything, no right was respected, but everything was trampled and crushed to the earth. The effort made by the citizens of that State to carry the last election was worthy of free Americans, they appealed to the ballot-box and succeeded in electing their governor, the members of the Legislature, and gave a majority to the presidential electors. And all this is to be wiped out by a returning board, acting without law and in direct opposition to the facts, as fully established by the evidence which I have read to-day. I said this was a conspiracy; I say so now. Can it succeed? I know the effort will be made to sustain it; but my appeal is to the virtue and intelligence of the nation.

I said in the beginning of my speech that the oppressions, cruelties, and tyrannies imposed on the people of Sicilly by Verres, and which at the time brought forth the indignation of the Roman senate and of the Roman world, and transmitted his name to after ages as one of the monsters of mankind and a disgrace to our race, do not compare in the least to the atrocities of every kind and character which for years have been inflicted on the people of Louisiana; all that the human mind can conceive in the shape of cruelty and oppression has been imposed on them with an iron will which has never relented.

I will read what I am informed by telegram received yesterday is perfectly true, namely:

NEW ORLEANS, January 6.

The radical senate has passed a jury bill designed to disfranchise, so its supporters say, one-half or two-thirds of the people of this State. The bill authorizes the attorney-general, and district attorneys and other prosecuting officers of the State, to challenge jurors in cases for certain causes. Kellogg's rump house shoved through another appropriation bill to-day giving $22,000 for stationery and blanks used in registration, and another giving about $100,000 to the returning board for their services, also several to pay smaller amounts to negro women claiming to be martyrs of bull-dozers, making the total appropriations to date half a million of dollars.

Other bills have been introduced amending the charters of all towns in the State that at the last election selected and elected democratic municipal officers, and also one amending the charter of this city in order to take the administration of city affairs out of the hands of democrats, and their bill creating the superior civil court, now signed and promulgated, puts every dollar's worth of taxable property into the hands of the judges of that court.

Thus destroying all political rights and all power of protection whatever against the infamous conspirators who by the bayonet are forced on this people.

A governor not elected by them is forced on them, and he one of the most infamous of mankind.

A Legislature not elected by them, but forced on them, and kept in power by the bayonets of the Army of the United States, and composed of the most degraded and corrupt men found in the State.

A judiciary forced on them composed of corrupt, venal, and ignorant men, the head of which has been pronounced by the Supreme Court of the United States to be corrupt and venal.

A system of assessment giving to the assessor a percentage on the amount assessed, thus holding out to him the inducement of the highest valuation, and from whose decision there is no appeal.

A rate of taxation based on this extraordinary valuation of over 6 per cent., thus virtually confiscating all the property in this State; and this was undoubtedly the object and purpose of the law.

A returning board claiming and exercising absolute control over all elections and from whose decision there is no appeal. The way this board has proceeded renders all elections a mere farce. It can make whom it pleases governor of the State, all the members of both houses of the Legislature, and the electors for President and Vice-President of the United States. A more complete contrivance to defeat the will of the people, and to keep forever any party in power, cannot be imagined.

A more perfect engine of unmitigated despotism never has existed before, infinitely worse than the old star chamber of England, which Macaulay said was and would forever remain a blot on English history.

We see at this time in that State two governments; that is, two governors, two legislatures, and a double judiciary, and a double set of officers in the city of New Orleans and throughout the State. One of these governments is elected by the people by a majority of near ten thousand, and is sustained by a still larger majority, and backed by the most respectable, the most intelligent, all the men of property in the city and State. Indeed in the large city of New Orleans it can be safely said that this government is sustained by nine-tenths of the entire population of both races and the entire wealth of the city. It can be safely said also, that at this time this government is upheld by the people of most every parish, and if it were permitted to remain in power the peace and prosperity of the State would inevitably be secured.

On the other hand, we have a governor and Legislature and judiciary forced on the people by the omnipotent power of a returning board, acting outside of the law, in violation of every principle of self-government, and upheld by the Army of the United States. The governor, a known peculator and carpet-bagger, abhorred by all the good people of the State of both races; a Legislature corrupt, venal, and ignorant; a judiciary at whose head sets a chief-justice pronounced by the Supreme Court of the United States to be corrupt and venal. This is a plain and unvarnished statement of the condition of affairs in that State at this time. And yet under this horrid condition of affairs the people there are peaceable and law-abiding, and all they ask of the Federal Government is to be let alone. They thus give the best guarantee of their good disposition and ability to discharge all the duties which may devolve on them. Yet in this Chamber there are men determined that this will not be allowed; but, on the contrary, in violation of all rights known to our American system, they are to be wiped out and a government not of their choice forced on them. This, I say, is a conspiracy long since hatched in New Orleans, and the actors are determined to carry their point regardless of consequences, and which may lead to a terrible and bloody conflict. I ask Senators to pause and reflect. I ask the President of the United States to pause also, and not to forget that he is the Chief Executive of the entire people and not of a party.

But, Mr. President, what do we see in the public press. The President, with all these facts known to all the world, and of course to him, shows a disposition to again use the Army of the United States to uphold the government created by the returning board, and in that way perpetuate this condition of anarchy in that State. In his letter to General Augur, the commanding officer there, he uses this singular language. He says:

It has been the policy of the Administration to take no part in the settlement of the question of rightful government in the State of Louisiana.

From my place as a Senator I entreat the President to carry out this declartion in good faith, and the trouble, confusion, and anarchy which have reigned there for years will immediately stop, and peace will at once assume full sway, the thieves and robbers kept in office by the Army will leave immediately; prosperity as of old will bless that land; property and liberty will be duly protected; the colored man will be justly maintained in all his rights and be a participant in the common blessing. The reason why this has not been so heretofore is because the policy of the Administratron has been to interfere all the time and for years in the settlement of the affairs of Louisiana. Carry out the policy now indicated by the President of non-interference, and at once peace, prosperity, quiet, contentment, and all the blessings of good government will follow, not only in Louisiana but in South Carolina.

Mr. President, I have done.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate but a few minutes, and only to reply to some new points, if indeed there are any, in the remarks made by the Senator from Missouri. Indeed, he has not only repeated what he said before, but he has stated once or twice that these points have not been answered. So far as the legal questions that he presented yesterday to the Senate are concerned, every one of them, I think, was fully answered by me some days ago. I think the Senator himself, if he will look over my remarks in the RECORD of the following day, will find that on the 14th of December, 1876, as printed on page 18 of the RECORD of the 15th, I took up every point of a legal character that he has made and replied to it. All the points that he has made, and many others besides, were made by Mr. Trumbull, Governor Palmer, and others in their paper, and every one of them was answered by me; whether successfully or not is for the Senate to say.

He again repeats what was said about the vacancy. I regret that the returning board did not fill the vacancy. I openly regretted it. So far as my opinion could influence them to do it, I was decidedly in favor of their filling it; but the reasons why it was not filled were stated by both Mr. Wells and Mr. Anderson publicly and are published in the proceedings of the board, I read them when I spoke before and do not care to read them again, I think they made a mistake in not filling up the board. The terms of the law do not require them to fill the board with a democrat. The spirit of the law does. The law required that the senate of the State should appoint men on that returning board composed of different political parties; and when the senate constituted that board they did put on it men of all political parties; the conservative party, the democratic party, and the republican party were all represented on the board. The law does not require the board, in filling vacancies, to observe that provision about the diversities of political opinion, but the spirit of the law does, and it seems to me that they ought to have appointed a democrat. No man, however, can contend that, because they failed to fill that vacancy, the majority of the board, still intact in their existence, had not the power to perform all the duties prescribed for the board. A quorum of the board consisted of a majority, and a majority could proceed to act and perform all the duties. It requires as large a number to make a quorum of four as of five; so that practically it would make no difference; but there was a disagreement between the personnel of that board as to how the vacancy should be filled, and so it remained unfilled.

Another point the Senator says I did not answer; but I did; it was answered fully. He says that it is necessary, in order to give the returning board jurisdiction, that within twenty-four hours after the consolidated returns are made up there should be attached to them the formal protest and affidavits. That is not the language of the law; that is not the spirit of the law; and no party in Louisiana acted upon that construction of the law, neither the democratic nor the republican party, and that is shown by the record.

Mr. BOGY. Will the Senator permit me to make a remark here?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BOGY. I do say the proof is abundant that the democratic party made that point and insisted upon it before the returning board. The argument is published in the very volume on the Senator's table. They insisted upon that point, and not only recently but in 1874.

Mr. SHERMAN. Please refer me to the page. My friend and I do not intend to mislead the Senate; but here is the point: The democratic attorneys did insist that to give the returning officers jurisdiction there should be a protest—and that was the controversy in 1874—and that that protest should be attached to the return sometime before the returning officers acted upon it.

It is true that was the decision made by the committee of the House; but that is not the point; and I will correct the Senator in another particular in a moment. The question I have to deal with now is whether that formal protest and these affidavits must be attached to the returns within twenty-four hours after they are made. I say the language of the law, of the twenty-sixth section of the act referred to so often, does not contain such a provision at all. The twenty-sixth section does not apply to attaching protests and affidavits; but it only requires that within twenty-four hours what is called the consolidated return should be made out. I will now read all the provisions of the law in regard to the formal protest when a protest is made setting out intimidation, &c.

When such statement is made by a commissioner of election or a supervisor of registration, he shall forward it in duplicate to the supervisor of registration of the parish, if in the city of New Orleans, to the secretary of state, one copy of which, if made to the supervisor of registration, shall be forwarded by him to the returning officers provided for in section 2 of this act, when he makes the returns of election in his parish.

This protest and formal allegation of intimidation must accompany the papers and must appear with the papers at the time of the action of the returning board; but, in another section of the act, entirely distinct, in another part of the law, the forty-third section, the consolidated return is required to be made up within twenty-four hours. It would be perfectly competent, therefore, after the consolidated return had been made up within twenty-four hours, at any time before the action of the returning officers, to attach to that formal return the protest and the affidavits.

The Senator said that the protests were not made in any of these disputed cases. All that I say now on this point is set out in the remarks I made on December 15 more fully than I state it now. I devoted nearly a column to giving the language of the law in reply to the statement made by Governor Palmer and his associates, and I will say that that construction has been acted upon by both political parties in Louisiana; that is, that the consolidated return must be made up within twenty-four hours, but that the formal protest and affidavits to give jurisdiction to the returning board might be attached to those returns at any time before the actual opening of the returns in the city of New Orleans by the returning officers.

The Senator then said that there was not a single return of this kind from any of the bull-dozed parishes. I was amazed when I heard my friend say that. I suppose what he meant to say was that there was not a single return attached within twenty-four hours after the returns came into the office of the parish officer. That is so. But when he said that there were no formal returns, no protests and affidavits attached to those returns, he simply fell into an error as I will now point out. The bull-dozed parishes are five in number. He will find on page 186 as to West Feliciana the formal return at the very beginning of the testimony. Here is the protest:

I, D. A. Weber, the undersigned, being supervisor of registration in and for the parish of West Feliciana and State of Louisiana, do on this 14th day of November, 1876, make this my protest against counting the votes in the following-named polling places, and for the reasons stated below, to wit.

Then he goes on to give the formal protest and giving the causes in the different wards. To that is attached quite a number of affidavits to bring the case within the language of the law. So much as to West Feliciana. There is afterward a sworn affidavit by the same officer showing the truth of these charges. The same kind of allegations are made by the supervisor of elections. There are two officers, one the supervisor of registration and the other the supervisor of elections.

Now, in regard to East Feliciana, my friend if he will look to page 223 will find there the formal protest, in the most formal language possible, signed by James E. Anderson, covering a page of printed matter, in which he says:

James E. Anderson, supervisor of registration for the parish of East Feliciana, under oath declares and states that he was the supervisor of registration in and for the said parish of East Feliciana during the registration or revision of registration held preceding the general election which was held on the 7th day of November, 1876, and that he was present in said parish during the time of said registration or revision of registration and of the said election with the exception of a period of about nineteen days, in the month of October and November, during which last-named period he was unable to remain in said parish and to exercise his functions as supervisor therein by reason of the insecurity of his life.

Then he goes on with a whole page setting out the particulars of intimidation which he alleges to have existed in that parish. He was the officer charged to make this return, and he concludes that there was not a fair election in that parish; and this is supported by the affidavits of several persons according to the language of the law. There is number two of the bull-dozed parishes where this formal affidavit and protest were made.

Now let us look at the next. On page 258 he will find the formal protest in regard to East Baton Rouge. Here is another formal protest.

STATE OF LOUISIANA,
Parish of Orleans:

F. A. Clover, being duly sworn, states that he was appointed supervisor of registration in and for the parish of East Baton Rouge, in the State of Louisiana, during the time of registration and revision of registration held last preceding and preparatory to the last election, held the 7th day of November, 1876; that as such supervisor of registration he conducted said registration and revision of registration from the 28th day of August to the 28th day of October, 1876, inclusive; that during the said time of registration and revision of registration there were riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, and bribery, and corrupt influences at and near the several places of registration and revision of registration in said parish, which said riot and tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, disturbance, and corrupt influences did tend to prevent, and did prevent, a fair, free, peaceable, and full vote of all the qualified electors of said parish; that by reason of said riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, disturbances, and corrupt influences, the election held in said parish on the 7th day of November, 1876, was not a fair, free, full, and peaceable vote of all the qualified electors of said parish.

Following the language of the law. Then he goes on and gives the details in the different wards of this intimidation in the very language and according to the express provisions of the law—as formal a document as could be prepared by any member of the Senate; and that also is supported by the affidavits required by the law.

Thus I have given three of the bull-dozed parishes. Now in regard to Ouachita, not to detain the Senate too long, I will refer to pages 23 and 24, where there is a condensed statement of the allegations as to Ouachita:

A statement made in due form of law by the proper officer accompanies the return of the election for the parish of Ouachita, reciting, inter alia, that from the 16th of October last to the 7th of November, the day of election, during the period of registration and revision of registration, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, disturbance, and corrupt influence, which tended to prevent a fair and free election by all the qualified voters of said parish, prevailed. A variety of testimony supporting such statement is found with the return.

Then it goes on afterward: "The supervisors of registration established certain polls," &c.; then it sets out in full this protest, with all the different wards in which the intimidation prevailed. Here was again a formal protest. So as to Morehouse Parish, which is the only remaining parish of the bull-dozed parishes, for there were but five. You find on page 441 a formal protest from that parish. Here it is signed by F. M. Grant, supervisor of registration of the parish of Morehouse:

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
State of Louisiana, Parish of Orleans.

This day personally came and appeared before me F. A. Woolfley, commissioner United States circuit court, district of Louisiana, duly commissioned and qualified, who being duly sworn, on oath deposes and says: That he is a citizen of the State of Louisiana, and a resident of the town of Bastrop, in the parish of Morehouse. That he is the legally appointed and qualified supervisor of registration of the said parish of Morehouse, and has been such continuously from and inclusive of the 28th day of August last past; that he entered upon the discharge of his official duties as such supervisor of registration upon the 28th day of August last past, and continued to perform the same during the whole period of registration and revision of registration to the present time, according to law and such lawful instructions as he has from time to time received from proper authority, to wit, the State registrar of voters.

Then he goes on and sets out the acts of intimidation and of alleged intimidation, and this is signed by F. M. Grant, supervisor of registration for the parish of Morehouse. That is accompanied by a number of affidavits, according to the express provisions of the law.

Neither the Senator nor myself is a resident of the State of Louisiana. Here are five distinct formal protests and notices accompanied by the official proof; and yet my friend says there was no protest from either of these bull-dozed parishes. They are all printed here and have been spread before the country; and not only that, but in order that there may be no question about it, that these protests were brought to the attention of the returning officers, the Senator will find in his own volume that he has brought here, that these protests were read to the returning officers in our presence and were the subject of frequent conversation and conversational debate in the presence of the visitors on both sides. He will find them as to West Feliciana on page 60 of their own stenographic report, as to West Feliciana on page 62, as to Ouachita on page 63, as to Morehouse on page 79, and as to East Baton Rouge on page 55. In our stenographic report he will find the same documents in the pages where these protests were read in the presence of all the persons assembled there to witness the count; and upon these protests, in the nature of a declaration, all the subsequent testimony was founded.

How my friend could have fallen into that error, I do not know. He was not there at the time. But that these protests were read, that they were actually filed and printed, there can be no doubt. It is true that my friend claims that they ought to have been filed within twenty-four hours. There is no ground for that; at least that was not the construction put upon it by those people. They, it is true, demanded that a formal protest should be made and that it should be attached to the return in some way, and as to one protest there was a controversy. As to the protest in De Soto, about which so much has been said, it was apparent and proved clearly enough that the supervisor brought the sealed package to New Orleans and there opened it. He need not have done it; he might have attached the paper to the very returns without opening them; but he chose to open them and there insert affidavits of a later date than the time the package purported to have been sealed. As soon as I saw that and the attention of the visitors was called to it, we said at once "that paper has been opened and tampered with"——

Mr. BOGY. That was a clerical error, according to Mr. Stoughton.

Mr. SHERMAN. No; there is where the Senator does injustice. Did not the Senator hear the Senator from New York correct that? Mr. Stoughton never said such a thing there in the world, and your own record shows it. The Senator was not there. There can be no desire on the part of the Senator from Missouri to do a distinguished citizen of the United States harm. I say to you that no man in New Orleans ever heard Mr. Stoughton make that remark. I was sitting by his side. Mr. Stoughton has denied it; I deny it; everybody there denies it, and the record of the statements made at the time shows that no such remark was made. The published reports in this very document show that the remark of Mr. Stoughton was very different. And yet my friend is so distorted by his feeling in regard to this matter that he would even do injustice to a distinguished and able lawyer, picking up a chance and false telegram published in the Northern States, rather than believe the testimony of his own stenographer.

I have shown you that the Senator is mistaken in regard to the formality of these proceedings. Now, what is this that has been read to you for two days? My friend talked about ex parte affidavits. There is a place here—I will call his attention to it—from page 456 to 643 of the document from which he has read, there is a mass of what are called "hickory affidavits," every one in hæc verba, covering nearly two hundred pages of printed matter. I will read you one of them, and they are all alike. Remember this was not evidence, as I will show you, before the returning board, but it is the evidence that is now printed at the expense of Congress. I will read but one of these affidavits, that of Wade Hampton—not the one in South Carolina, but another man, a colored man in Louisiana.

THE STATE OF LOUISIANA,
Parish of East Feliciana:

I, Wade Hampton, of ward No. 8, said parish, do solemnly swear that I was present at the polls in said parish during the election held November 7, 1876, and that the election was fair and peaceable, and I know of no one having been intimidated or threatened in the casting his vote, but every voter was apparently eager and anxious to vote, and did so voluntarily; and that I voted the only parish ticket out, and the democratic State and national ticket freely and voluntarily, and under no constraint, fear, or intimidation.

WADE + HAMPTON.
mark.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this —— day of November, 1876.
[SEAL.] H. M. POOLE.
Deputy Clerk.

This was in East Feliciana, a parish where there were three colored voters to one white voter, where in every previous election there was a large republican majority; where the evidence as printed shows an absolute state of terror that is so clear that no man can doubt it; and where in consequence of that terror there was not one single republican vote cast in the whole parish; and yet here are over two hundred pages of affidavits in the very same form, printed—I saw them, perhaps the Senator saw them—not signed, but marked by these negro people, and these were brought in there, and are printed now at the public expense here. The testimony as to this parish showed acts of murder, violence, and intimidation so disgraceful that I do not care to repeat them. I read some of it the other day; and this is the rebuttal.

In these one thousand pages, that it took nearly a month to produce before the Senate, there are five hundred and forty-one printed pages of just such informal affidavits as I have now read; much of the rest is made up of official documents. Under the rules adopted by the returning officers, no ex parte affidavits were allowed except those affidavits provided for by the law attached to and made part of the formal protest. The rest of the testimony taken on behalf of the republican electors consisted of depositions taken in due form. The affidavits were attached to the returns, and among the rules of the returning officers adopted by the board was this:

9. No ex parte affidavits or statements shall be received in evidence except as a basis to show that such fraud, intimidation, or other illegal practice, had at some poll, requires investigation; but the returns and affidavits authorized by law, made by officers of election or in verification of statements as required by law, shall be received in evidence as prima facie.

Those that the law required; namely, the affidavits attached to the protest of the officers should be received as prima facie evidence to give the returning officers jurisdiction; but if they then pursued their inquiry and took testimony, they had to take it in strict accordance with the law of Louisiana, and it was so done. The Senator says that all this was before the returning officers; but it was in plain violation of their rules, and could not have been received by them as evidence. But what if it was? Any impartial man may take this mass of one thousand pages and he will find that, with slight exceptions, it does not impair in the least or conflict with the testimony that I read to you the other day. With the exception of here and there a witness, especially one who testifies to the bad character of Eliza Pinkston, and probably one or two other witnesses whose testimony was read, who say that the murder of Dinkgrave was not a political murder, it does not reach the allegations made and presented to you the other day in scarcely a single respect. He read from parishes that were not controverted. He read about parishes as to which there is no evidence in the book from which I quoted.

Mr. BOGY. I read from no parish except rejected parishes or those in which polls were rejected.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator read from two parishes that I do not see anything at all about, Bossier and Webster.

Mr. BOGY. Polls were thrown out both in Bossier and Webster.

Mr. SHERMAN. Here a witness come up and says that, so far as he knows, in a particular ward or particular place there was no intimidation. With the exception of five parishes, where the bull-dozing or intimidation extended to the whole parish, there was no allegation that intimidation extended over a whole parish, but only that it existed in a particular ward or particular polling-place. There the particular precinct may have been rejected upon sufficient proof of intimidation, and all the rest of the people of that parish might swear that there was a free and fair election. Take this testimony now, and I say to you that any person who will examine it carefully and compare it side by side with that in the book I read from will see that there is no substantial conflict in this with the mass of testimony I read to you the other day. People testify to what they hear, to what they think; they did not see this; they did not see that. They all concur that on the day of election there was no intimidation. So do the witnesses called by the republican side, that on the day of the election in many places there was silence like that of the grave; there was no necessity of intimidation on the day of election. There was one man attacked and supposed to be killed on the morning of the election in Onachita because he had a ballot-box in his hand and was going to hold an election at Logtown. He was killed, as was supposed, but by some miracle he was alive again. That is Ben. James. Nobody questioned or controverted his testimony. He was shot on the morning of the election and the ballot-box taken from him and the ballots burned, and there was no election held in Logtown at all by reason of that intimidation. These specific allegations of crimes, offenses, intimidation, are not met at all by this mass of ex parte affidavits to which we have listened yesterday and to-day.

From what has been read here in all this mass of testimony, what is there that affects the testimony of General Brooks, of Clayton Hale, of officers of the Army and officers of the election, of men who were wounded, and the specific cases of killing. You might pile mountain-high until the pile rose to the Dome of the Capitol statements that men did not see a thing or did not know a thing, or that so far as they saw was all peaceable and quiet; but if you are met on the other hand by affirmative proof of cases without number of intimidation, such proof as that is no answer. No, sir; I say the case made by me the other day is not impaired in the least.

My friend in his closing remarks talks about the injury to the people of Louisiana. He speaks of Packard as the most infamous of mankind. Sir, Packard is a man of character and standing. He has lived there for years. What is the charge against him? What has he done? Has he murdered or robbed?

Mr. BOGY. Robbed for years and done nothing else in that State.

Mr. SHERMAN. Nobody will say that of him in Louisiana. I heard your friends the democrats speak of Packard in the very highest terms.

Mr. BOGY. His character in New Orleans is that of an infamous robber. [Applause in the galleries.]

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I do not believe that could be said in New Orleans. Yes, sir, these galleries may shout their applause; but I say that when the charge is made that Mr. Packard is a man of that character it is wrong.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I rise to order. I move that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to arrest the persons who have committed this disorder and clear the galleries at once.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. MCCREERY in the chair.) Those in favor of the motion——

Mr. ALCORN. I would suggest to the honorable Senator that this portion of the galleries [pointing to the galleries on the left of the chair] did not participate in the applause at all, and I ask him to modify the motion so as to clear the galleries in which the disorder occurred.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the Senator will withdraw the motion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will not withdraw it. This thing must be stopped.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have gone through one scene of this kind in 1861 when I was treated in the same way by the same class of people.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I propose to assert the proprieties of this Chamber, and I insist on the motion.

Mr. ALCORN. Will the Senator allow me my interpellation to his motion? The portion of the galleries to which I pointed was entirely quiet.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If that be certain, I will agree to that.

Mr. ALCORN. I am sure of it. Occupied as it is by ladies, I am sure they were quiet.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Sergeant-at-Arms clear those portions of the galleries from which the disturbance proceeded and let him arrest every person who was concerned in it.

Mr. WHYTE. He cannot do that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let him bring them here, and we will tell whether they are guilty or not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Sergeant-at-Arms will proceed to clear the galleries on the right of the chair.

The galleries referred to were cleared.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio will proceed.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I regret very much that any citizen has been inconvenienced. I have no doubt a great many people have been turned out of the galleries who took no part in this violation of our rules, but I hope that this will convince the galleries that the Senate of the United States must not be interrupted in the ordinary course of its proceedings by applause or such scenes as we have had here. In the last few days in both Houses it has more or less occurred. We must maintain the order and decorum of debate. If we are to have crowds of people here interfering with our debates, with our ordinary proceedings, we do not know what will be the result. While I am sorry for those that have been inconvenienced without any fault on their part, I trust that it will be a lesson to all that when they come to the galleries of the Senate they should at least give us the benefit of silence and patience and listen to us without any applause or manifestations of any kind.

Mr. President, I did not know Mr. Packard very well, and I never saw him until I went to New Orleans. I have heard from Senators from Maine, I have heard from members of Congress from Maine that he is a man of very high character. My friend over the way [Mr. HAMLIN] has known him, and I heard people in Louisiana speak of him. When a Senator of the United States feels himself at liberty to stand up and arraign a governor of a State as the most infamous of mankind——

Mr. BOGY. Not a governor.

Mr. SHERMAN. Well, when a Senator arraigns a man who has held his position, as the most infamous of mankind, he abuses the privileges of the Senate of the United States. I say that very distinctly and emphatically.

Now, Mr. President, in regard to the supreme court, many of the judges of the supreme court of Louisiana, some of them at least are native-born citizens of Louisiana, men whose appearance and conduct impressed me very highly and very favorably; and yet that whole court is denounced because, forsooth, the chief-justice, Ludeling, bid off in connection with eight or nine or more democrats, leading prominent citizens of Louisiana and of New Orleans now, a railroad for the interest of common stockholders; and because the conduct of those people were arraigned by the Supreme Court of the United States the supreme court of Louisiana is denounced as infamous, as the most corrupt in this country. It seems to me that was a great abuse of the privileges of the Senate. I read only the other day in a paper in Louisiana the reply of this same chief-justice when he singled out from the crowd around him leading prominent citizens of the democratic persuasion in New Orleans who were his partners in bidding off that railroad; that he acted simply as trustee, and there was no infamy attached to him or to them. But because, forsooth, they chose to throw mud and spite at these officers because they are republicans, the same spirit that led those gangs of ruffians at night to negro cabins would seek to degrade these men in high official position and stamp their names, in the presence of the Senate of the United States, with infamy.

Sir, I said a moment ago that we had gone through this scene once before. I remember in 1856 when as a member of the other House of Congress I was sent on a mission to inquire into the conduct of the border ruffians of Missouri. When the motion was made to make that inquiry it was alleged on the part of the citizens of Kansas that wholesale intimidation, wholesale ballot-box stuffing, wholesale election frauds had been committed in that Territory, by which they were entirely deprived of the elective franchise. I heard that denied by members from Missouri; I heard that denied by democrats in the same wholesale way that these denials are made now; and one of those Missouri members was put on a committee sent out there to investigate into the matter. I was one of the committee. We went out there and we found that our very colleague who denied that these atrocities existed had been over there with a gang of one hundred and eighty men and made a speech to them on the day of the election when these Missourians voted there at one of the feeble precincts of Kansas. I heard another gentleman from that State also deny that any border ruffians had gone over from Missouri into Kansas, when I myself saw armed, equipped, in full force, one hundred men march over into Kansas, and heard soon after of the outrages that they committed; and yet the Delegate from Kansas, living in Missouri at the time, denied these atrocities when they were proven by living witnesses, and now they are a part of the established history of the country. Who does not know now that these atrocities were committed in Kansas by which a feeble Territory was ridden down by border ruffians who had no right there? Now these facts are known to all the world. And, sir, from the blood shed on the soil of Kansas there rose a republican State that is now able to defend itself; and my only hope is that these kindred outrages upon the poor negroes of Louisiana may give rise to a public feeling in that State which will not only defend them, but enable them and their successors hereafter, and their children in future ages, to maintain their rights against all lawless violence. No, sir, you cannot deny these things. They exist there.

They talk about the oppression of the people of Louisiana; they talk about the taxes. Well, sir, if I can believe the official documents which were shown me there, the oppression does not exist at all to the extent that is said. Undoubtedly by the results of the war, by the disturbance of their labor, the natural and inevitable results of the rebellion, the taking up of arms against the just authority of the United States, property is deranged, and property has gone down greatly in value, in consequence of the war and in consequence of the emancipation of the slaves; but they ought not to complain of the natural and legitimate results of their own conduct.

But to come back, Mr. President, I say now that the case made by me the other day is not materially shaken by any testimony that has been read by the Senator from Missouri. It is true that a doubt may be created whether or not Eliza Pinkston told a true story. I have never said anything more about that than that I believed, not from the testimony of Eliza Pinkston, but from the testimony of the other witnesses who corroborated her, that her testimony was true. It is now admitted and conceded and proven by a number of witnesses that on the very night in question one of these rifle companies did maraud in that very neighborhood and did whip, scourge, and injure people. Is it likely that Ben Brooks, or whatever his name is, a single man, and who now lives there among those people, would have gone off to kill Henry Pinkston and wound his wife and kill his child? Does anybody believe that? Did any one there believe it? I do not think so. The evidence will still remain and the impression will still exist, although it is not material to this case, that the same men who committed the violence in the neighborhood around committed this violence on Henry Pinkston; but whether they did or not makes no difference to this issue. Drive Henry Pinkston out of the case and you have murder after murder, violence after violence, and wrong after wrong in that same neighborhood proven beyond question or controversy. Suppose it to be true that Dinkgrave was killed by somebody who wanted to revenge a private wrong on account of a private quarrel; it is equally true that the negroes thought that the killing of Dinkgrave was a political murder to deprive them of their chief leader, and they rose for the first time in the parish of Ouachita, showed the spirit of freemen by arousing and organizing to some extent, but gradually disbanded again, feeble as they are. They thought that the killing of Dinkgrave was a political murder, and the other murders there are not controverted. You may sap here and there, pick here and there a flaw as to a single outrage, but the mass of outrages still stands undisturbed, uncontradicted, unshaken by even ex parte testimony.

Mr. President, I do not want to proceed with this matter further. I simply want to stand by the verdict of history; and I say to you that, notwithstanding the denial that has been made by the honorable Senator from Missouri, notwithstanding all this controversy, these facts are recorded in the history of Louisiana like the massacre at Colfax, like the massacre of over two hundred men in Mechanics' Institute, like all these other outrages that have been named and so often described by my eloquent friend from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] they stand recorded in history. Those that I have depicted, about which I heard the testimony taken, will stand also admitted and conceded facts in the history of that State.

Now, sir, the Senator says that because of these outrages a majority of six or seven or eight thousand, I believe he said, was overturned. They claim in this book 6,549 exactly. These are the figures certified by Mr. Zacharie and his friends. John McEnery received, according to their figures, 83,723. William Pitt Kellogg, 77,174, making a majority of 6,549 as they claim. If we can believe the testimony of the witnesses, in these five bull-dozed parishes alone there was a change of over 8,000 votes. That this testimony is substantially true, I believe, as true as history. But who can decide between the honorable Senator and me? He and I have given our story, perhaps taking a party view of it; and who is to decide the matter? The law of Louisiana. That law provides a set of officers who shall decide this question. They have decided it. They have decided according to the law of Louisiana. They met openly, publicly, in the light of day. They saw the whole of this testimony on both sides, whatever it is. They were citizens of Louisiana legally appointed to do this very duty and to pass judgment on these very facts. They have decided them. Their decision is in writing, made under their oaths, with every temptation to them to decide the other way. Their return has been made; the officers elected according to their return have exercised their duty; and now you attack the rights of the State of Louisiana thus ascertained according to the law of Louisiana. You would throw these to the wind because, forsooth, they endanger the election of Samuel J. Tilden.

Not only did these returning officers act legally within the strict limit of the authority conferred upon them by law, but they acted upon a weight of testimony that was overwhelming and justified them in throwing out all the votes they threw out. They did not do it in gross; they did not do it in the lump; they did it in detail by parishes; two parishes thrown out altogether; in other cases polling precincts and wards rejected. They have acted and made their return. Now you want to make another returning board out of the House of Representatives, or out of the Senate, or out of both, far removed from the scene of operations, not familiar with the history of the times, not familiar with the scenes of outrage, not familiar with the weight of the testimony; and you propose to make a returning board at this distance to pass in review what has been done. You propose to trample down the rights of the people of Louisiana, which were ascertained according to the laws of Louisiana, for the purpose of giving force and effect to the violence, tumult, and murder that prevailed before the election. That is what you propose to do. No, it will not do, my friend. This is a government of law, to be governed not only by law, but according to the forms of law; and although this returning board may have erred here and there in regard to particular polling-places and precincts, even admit that that be possible, supposing the statements read by the Senator from Missouri have made some impression on your mind, to show you that perhaps these people have given too great force and effect to the testimony before them; suppose they have erred, are you, without any information without any law to justify you, without any authority, to review their decision here a thousand miles away? There is the question. According to law that vote is recorded; you cannot reverse it; and it is rightly recorded. The only purpose and object of my speech the other day was to show you, by reading the testimony of living witnesses, not merely colored people, who are conceded to be ignorant, cannot read and cannot write many of them—it is their misfortune—but by the testimony of witnesses of the very highest character, undisputed and uncontroverted, that tumult, disorder, violence, and intimidation did prevail over a number of parishes and polling-places in Louisiana sufficient to change the result. In forty-one parishes there was a peaceful, orderly election. In those forty-one parishes there was an increased republican majority. In the five bull-dozed parishes the republican majority was swept away, and an overwhelming democratic majority substituted. In these other parishes, where intimidation prevailed to a greater or less degree, our majority has been largely lessened or swept away; but in all those parishes, or the great body of them, where there was a fair election, we gained rather than lost; we have an increased majority rather than a diminished majority. Why was it if there was no intimidation, why was it if this intimidation did not affect the result, that in the parishes where there was conceded to be a fair election the republicans gained, while in all the parishes where intimidation prevailed they lost? The logic of the facts is as conclusive as the testimony of witnesses. This result was brought about by the intimidation prevailing to a greater or less degree in those parishes.

Mr. BOGY. Mr. President, I am happy to believe that this case is coming to something like what the lawyers call a definite issue. The Senator from Ohio admits that the law creating the returning board, and which is embraced within the three sections, the third, twenty-sixth, and forty-third, has not been complied with, unless the making of affidavits in the city of New Orleans, many weeks after the election, be a compliance. He says that before the board no one raised an objection to the receiving of evidence of intimidation or wrongdoing in the parishes because a statement of that fact had not accompanied the return of the election. I tell the Senator from Ohio that the democratic counsel continually insisted that the law was plain, and that it was not within the power of that board to receive any testimony unless the foundation had been laid by a return at the proper time. I will read the sections of the law, and hope the Senators will give me their attention for a moment, because it is so plain that I am astonished that a gentleman of the acknowledged ability of the Senator from Ohio should undertake to give a different construction to this law. The forty-third section says:

> It shall be the duty of the supervisors of registration, within twenty four hours after the receipt of all the returns for the different polling-places, to consolidate such returns to be certified as correct by the clerk of the district court, and forward the consolidated returns with the originals received by him to the returning officers provided for in section 2 of this act, the said report and returns to be inclosed in an envelope of strong paper or cloth, securely sealed, and forwarded by mail. He shall forward a copy of any statement as to violence or disturbance, bribery, or corruption, or other offenses specified in section 26 of this act.

With this law before him the Senator from Ohio contends that a return made from a parish can be opened in the city of New Orleans, and in that return be introduced a statement made weeks after the election. The question is too plain to be discussed. What does the twenty-sixth section say? The twenty-sixth section reads:

> When such statement is made by a commissioner of election or a supervisor of registration, he shall forward it in duplicate to the supervisor of registration of the parish, if in the city of New Orleans, to the secretary of state, one copy of which, if made to the supervisor of registration, shall be forwarded by him to the returning officers provided for in section 2 of this act, when he makes the returns of election in his parish. His copy of said statement shall be so annexed to his returns of elections by paste, wax, or some adhesive substance, that the same can be kept together.

Now, does not the law require that when the return of the election in a parish is made, if there has been any intimidation or violence of any description whatever occurring on the day of the election or at the time of registration, the fact shall be embraced in a statement which shall accompany the return of the election? There is the point. He only reads a part of the law. He says it does not require it within twenty-four hours; but whether it requires it within twenty-four or forty-eight hours, let that be as it may, it has to accompany the return of the election and be sent by mail. In this case, without exception from what he called the bull-dozed parishes, the returns were not sent by mail, but taken to New Orleans by the supervisors, kept in their pockets for days. In one case it was plainly proven that it had been opened and a certificate put in, the seal of course had been broken to do it; but in every case they were opened by these men in New Orleans before they were handed over to the returning board and false certificates introduced in them. This I again say is in direct and plain contradiction to the law, as found in the third, twenty-sixth, and forty-third sections.

My point and the point made by the democrats of Louisiana was this, that a statement of intimidation or violence had to accompany the return of the election, and unless it was so made, the board had no jurisdiction. No one in New Orleans of standing denies that to be the law; no lawyer of standing there denies this. I was there myself a short time and talked with many leading men, and none denied that to be the law. The committee sent by the House of Representatives one year ago in their report, an extract from which I read to the Senate yesterday, say it is the law, and when that board in 1874 under the same law returned a Legislature as elected without having regard to this portion of the law, they said it was illegal. Therefore I say all the testimony presented to that board taken in New Orleans was illegal, and their decision utterly and absolutely void.

The Senator mentions the returns of Weber from West Feliciana, of Anderson from East Feliciana, of Clover from East Baton Rouge, of a man by the name of Ward from Grant. I read testimony yesterday and to-day showing that this man Weber was an infamous man, a rascal, and a dog of low degree; and that after the election he had stated, not to one person, but to many, before he went down to New Orleans, where he was bribed to lie that the election had been fair and without any violence whatever. Anderson! There are no words that can convey a correct idea of his meanness. He is the fellow that shot himself to make it appear that his life was in danger from democrats. It is proven that he shot through his own clothes, trying to bull-doze himself. It is positively proven that this Anderson had perpetrated upon himself the assault which he said had been done by democrats. Clover! I proved yesterday by the testimony of more than one witness that this fellow admitted that the election was fair, peaceable, and quiet. But like his associates in crime he goes to New Orleans, and after he is there some ten or fifteen days new light breaks on him, and he makes an affidavit of intimidation. A fellow by the name of Ward is sent to Grant Parish as supervisor of registration of the entire parish. This fellow keeps a snake-show on the levee in New Orleans, and it was proven by testimony read by me to-day that this snake-show man only registered such persons as suited him in the different precincts of this parish. A fellow who keeps a snake-show on the levee of New Orleans is selected by the governor of Louisiana to go to one of the parishes of that State to do this important work. This alone shows the means employed to insult and mortify the citizens of that State, and a willingness to use the vilest instruments to effect the predetermined purpose to cheat the people out of their votes. Who can for a moment entertain a doubt of the purpose in sending such a man to perform this duty? And the proof shows that he did as was expected by his employers.

These men, one and all, have been proven to be unworthy of belief—Weber, Anderson, Clover, Ward—by the testimony of respectable men. But, sir, in each of the bull-dozed parishes I read the certificate of the clerk of the parish, not an ex parte affidavit, but the certificate of the clerk of the parish, that no statement of intimidation had been filed and that the election in each one had been peaceable and quiet. In East Feliciana, about which the Senator from Ohio talks so much to-day, as he did the other day, and says there was so much intimidation that the republicans dared not vote, this was fully explained by me yesterday. I read testimony showing that the republicans, finding a great change in the colored vote of that parish and that the colored men had determined to vote the democratic ticket, agreed among themselves not to vote. They had no candidate in the parish. I proved by testimony taken in the parish that there was perfect peace and quiet pervading it all the time, and the reasons the republicans did not vote was because they would not do so. The fact that they did not vote was a trick, worthy of the fellows who have for some time held sway in that State. I regret that such mean tricks can find friends and supporters anywhere.

I admire the Senator's courage when he holds on to the skirts of Eliza Pinkston, but I cannot say I commend his good taste; for if there is a woman whose skirts I would not hold to, it certainly would be Eliza Pinkston's. Who is Eliza Pinkston? In his former speech he held her up here as worthy of credit, as a woman who had been persecuted, an innocent, virtuous mother, who had lost her child, and been cruelly treated by the democratic regulators. Although he yet stands up for her, yet he does not do so as confidently as formerly. Although her character does not now stand quite as high as at first, they nevertheless insist she was bull-dozed by some democratic club. I read the proof from the man who formerly owned her; I read other testimony showing that all this thing was a quarrel among colored people themselves. When she first came to New Orleans her story was believed by no one, and it was only after some days that the Kelloggs, Packards, and others found out it could be manufactured into a most sensational election story and great capital got out of it. Well, it has run its day, and now I believe the Senator from Ohio is the only one who believes in this story.

I have no doubt murders have occurred in different parishes, as is the case elsewhere, but they have been multiplied tenfold; some of them occurred a year ago; some two years since. I read abundant testimony to show that these crimes were not political, but grew out of the peculiar condition of society there, and also instigated by the bad men who now control the State, and fostered by a government which not only did not afford protection to life or property, but abetted crime and protected the perpetrators of crime.

We must not forget that there is in Louisiana a large colored population suddenly emancipated. They are brought in conflict with the white race, and a feeling of hatred encouraged by Kellogg & Co., and, as a matter of course, more or less violence is the natural consequence. But the proof is that these conflicts are very seldom political.

The Senator from Ohio has a happy talent to give a new life to ancient animosities. He goes back to that old quarrel called the Kansas excitement of 1856, and says that the story of that day has been stamped upon the pages of history as the truth. I deny it. The story, or rather stories, of that day are believed but by few people of this day. Every impartial man now well understands how these stories were fabricated to inflame the public mind and in that way to create, as these lies did create, the anti-slavery excitement which in time swept over the land; but the old lies are now not believed and the pages of history will not be encumbered with such stuff. I have read testimony enough in the Senate for two days to show conclusively that the people of Louisiana are a law-abiding people; that the last election held in that State was peaceable, quiet, and orderly; that there was no intimidation, violence, or wrong-doing at any of the precincts in any of the parishes, and that those parishes which were rejected, the list of which I gave, were perfectly orderly and quiet and in no instance was there any proof otherwise, excepting proof gotten up in the city of New Orleans from ex parte affidavits and presented to the returning board in violation of law.

The Senator says the affidavits in the testimony I have read are ex parte. Some of them are; but most of them are answers to interrogatories propounded, as he says, under the law of Louisiana. Open the book containing the testimony on his side where you please and you will see that most of them made their mark. Nine-tenths of it is composed of the affidavits of men taken in New Orleans not known, men who could be got to swear to anything for money, while the testimony which I have read was taken in the parishes where the election took place, in many cases of men who were officers of the parishes, or of men who were long residents, in other cases of the supervisors of election or the clerks of the parishes, all men of standing and character, and this testimony taken at home, given by men who had a right to know and did know what had transpired at their homes.

Now he says the testimony which I have read only shows that persons had not observed that anything wrong had transpired. It is not so, sir. The testimony is positive that the election was peaceable and quiet.

To show that the Senator from Ohio has not made himself acquainted with this case he all the time uses the words "formal protest." There is no such word in that law. There is no "formal protest" recognized or known in it; but he persistently calls it however a formal protest made in the city of New Orleans and read by the returning board. Of course these formal protests, as he calls them, were made in the city of New Orleans and in very good form, beyond a doubt, and sworn to by such infamous fellows as Weber, and Anderson, and Clover, and this snake-showman, Ward, all in first-rate form, beyond a doubt, but all made outside of the law or the authority of the law, and in direct conflict with it.

Sixty-nine polls were rejected in twenty-two parishes. I read the list yesterday. It will appear as part of my speech when published; in this I give the number of votes rejected at each poll, and from what parish, and as regards every one of them I made it my duty yesterday and to-day to detain the Senate, very much against my wish, to place before it testimony showing that the election had been fair, peaceable, and quiet.

The Senator says, however, that this testimony was not in evidence before the board. I presume in one respect this statement is correct, but it was presented to the board, filed with it, and copied from its archives; but I have no doubt that that board did not look upon it as evidence. I have no doubt that the statement of the Senator in that respect is correct, and I am surprised he admits it. Why did not the board consider it, while it gave full effect to the testimony taken in New Orleans of unknown men, who generally could know nothing as to what had transpired in these distant parishes. It was filed, and is there yet, and ought to have been received as evidence, but I am sorry to say it was not.

Mr. President, this will at last be the turning-point in this case; and it is not within the ability of the Senator from Ohio to change that fact. The law is imperative that the statement of intimidation, or violence, or any wrong-doing occurring on the day of the election, at the polls, has to be incorporated in a paper called a statement and returned with the vote of that parish. If that be the law, as I say it is, as the House committee sent down there one year ago said it was, and as every lawyer of standing in New Orleans says it is, then all the testimony taken by the returning board in New Orleans was outside of the law, and is a nullity.

But the Senator says that in this country we cannot maintain government unless we observe law. That is true. But what is law? The existence of an institution like this returning board is a contradiction of all our idea of law. To give to four men the power to say who has or who has not been elected; to decide this in secret and without any appeal; and to call that law! Why, it is an abuse of terms to call such a monstrosity law. It is tyranny and oppression, and such tyranny and oppression as ought not to be upheld by any body, particularly in this country.

The Senator seems to take me to task for saying that Packard is infamous. I do say that he is one of the most infamous of mankind. I said it before and I say it now, and I am not aware that I am abusing my privilege. Why is he infamous? Any man who by force and fraud, as he is doing, will try to impose himself upon a community as the governor of that community is infamous; he is a tyrant. I repeat what I said before, that he is an infamous man, and the proof sustains me in what I say. I say the same thing with regard to the judiciary. Why? Because the Supreme Court of the United States have passed upon this Ludeling. It is true he denies it. The Senator from Ohio believes his denial, but does not believe the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. He read a statement the other day, which I saw also in the papers, in which this man Ludeling says it is all false. Of course it is false in his estimation; but who are we to believe, the man charged with a criminal offense or the Supreme Court of the United States? And I also say that men are infamous who will take judgeships under the conditions that exist in New Orleans to-day. The so-called rump legislature, in session there without a quorum, is passing laws doing away with former judges and creating new courts, and upholding those new judges in power at the point of the bayonet. I say that men who will accept judicial stations under such circumstances make themselves infamous, and when they get upon the bench their decisions will be corrupt and venal.

I am not speaking without facts before me. The whole government in Louisiana, as I said in the speech which I made to-day, is a vile conspiracy to destroy that people, and to rob them of their property; a vile conspiracy which neither the spirit of the age or of this people ought to permit. Every man who is an officer under the local government at New Orleans is already rich or being enriched every day, from Kellogg down; yet these fellows pretend to be offended when they are called infamous. Sir, it is a duty I owe to myself and to the position I occupy, to state what I honestly believe, that these men are rogues and rascals, and until a public opinion in this country is created of a wholesome character which will openly expose these robbers and call them by their right names, you will be governed by rogues and infamous men as is now the case not only in Louisiana but elsewhere.

Mr. President, this long debate is approaching an end. I am heartily glad of it, but I am also glad that it has taken place. It has placed before this country the horrid condition of Louisiana; and the people of the United States will now examine into it, will read the testimony which will be found in my speech, and I am convinced it will open the eyes of many.

As I said to-day, upward of two thousand years ago, Verres, the propretor in Sicily, was guilty of rapacity and robbery and murder. When Cicero arraigned him before the Roman senate it aroused the indignation of the old Romans, and Verres was recalled and punished. That great old Roman senate, although under the pagan dispensation, called back the infamous propretor and punished him, and the history we read of the crimes of this man does not compare with that of the crimes committed in Louisiana; tyranny of every description that the human mind can conceive; courts forced upon them; legislatures forced upon them; incompetent men put into office; a system of assessment, the invention of a fiendish cunning, giving to the assessor a percentage upon the valuation he affixes, and from which there is no appeal! And this the Senator calls law. What is law but a rule of right? Yes, sir; a rule of right. In Louisiana it is a rule of wrong, inspired by bad men to accomplish wrong ends. That is not law. It may be on the statute-book, but it is a desecration of the sacred word "law," which should be a rule of right and made to protect the right and shield the innocent, and not to rob.

Gentlemen may say what they please; thank God the day has passed when you can impose on this people any further these horrid stories that have been related in this Chamber for years as to the bad character and conduct not only of the people of Louisiana but of all the Southern States. They are like the stories gotten up many years ago in England by Titus Oates, fabrications; one lie piled upon another; one man more infamous than another springing up every day and adding a pile of additional lies. Sir, there is no more disposition to commit murder in the South than there is in the North. The men there are as much law-abiding and are as much under the sway of Christian influence as they are in any portion of the North.

But, sir, the conflict there arises from the fact that you have forced upon those people a foreign government, composed of bad men who go there to rob and to steal; and that they may rob and steal they must necessarily violate every principle of justice and of right. The time has come when those people will be vindicated, and this condition of affairs there cannot be bull-dozed any longer. The returning board can stand no more. It has made its last return; and even that return will not stand. The people of the United States are not going to submit that these four men, without character or reputation, shall make a President for the whole United States. Can it be possible that the people of this country will permit Wells, Anderson, Casanave, and Kenner, two white and two colored men, to make a President of the United States? The thing is too absurd to talk about; and yet this is called law. A more complete system of oppression and of tyranny and robbery cannot be devised by the wit of man than has been devised to enslave and rob Louisiana.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I congratulate the Senate at least that my friend from Missouri has made some advance in information. He stated emphatically in his speech, repeating it twice over, and it will be found reported in the stenographic notes, that there was no protest from either of the five bull-dozed parishes. I put it to him, "Do you mean that there was no protest at all, or no protest within twenty-four hours?"

Mr. BOGY. There is no such word as "protest" in the law, to begin with. The law calls it a "statement." The Senator is not familiar with the law.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator stated to the Senate that there was no such statement made from any of the bull-dozed parishes. I call it a protest. I put the question to him "Does the Senator mean no statement, or does he mean simply no statement within twenty-four hours," and he repeated the remark in its broadest sense. Now I have read him, in every one of those cases the full, formal, authentic statement, as formal as he could draw himself, and what does he reply? He does not say "I overlooked these affidavits; I beg pardon for leading the Senate into an error which I fell into myself, for I had not read these affidavits;" not at all, but he says the men that made these statements are rascals, thieves, liars, scoundrels! That is not argument. I have given the exact fact, and the record will show it. How can we answer logically such arguments? I endeavored to relieve the honorable Senator from Missouri by telling him "If you differ as to what is a legal statement, let us have the difference about the law stated; do you claim that the statement must be made within twenty-four hours? I say there is no such provision." The Senator would not accept that, but he said again, repeating it over two or three times, that there were no statements from either of the five bull-dozed parishes. Here they are. Now when he has found that in that particular at least he was wrong, he says these men are rascals, showing that he knew all about them, that he knew that they were the supervisors, that they made the protest, because he goes on to tell us one man is a thief, another man a liar, another man shot himself, and so on; he goes off into collateral matters.

Mr. President, that is not the way, it seems to me, to discuss such a matter. The truth is those protests were filed by the officers, as they believed according to law. They were carried down by these officers, and they testify to it themselves. They were carried down by these officers, were delivered, and there they attached their formal protest and affidavit to them, in some cases by sealing-wax according to the language of the law. They did it in New Orleans. I claim that that is legal; he denies it; but he denied first that there were statements. Now he says that the men who made them are rascals. I do not know whether they are or not. I am not prepared to say that every republican in Louisiana is a rascal. I know that in the northern States where I live we have good democrats.

Mr. BOGY. I think there are some honest men among the republicans there.

Mr. SHERMAN. I doubt very much if there was any honest republican who voted the republican ticket in Louisiana whether he would be honest in the eye of my friend, he is so discolored by his feeling. Did I show any such feeling? Did I not speak kindly of Nicholls and all these other gentlemen? I came in contact with many of them and was highly pleased with them. These men are not bad men; and Packard, who is denounced here as the worst man in the country, is a sober, orderly Maine man. My honorable friend from Maine says he has known him for years and he is spoken of very kindly. Indeed I heard democrats say if they were to have a republican governor at all they would rather have Packard than any one else. Yet he is the worst man in the whole country according to the Senator; and Judge Ludeling, the statement about whom made by the Supreme Court is referred to, is arraigned. Why arraign Judge Ludeling and stamp his name with infamy here in the Senate? I do not care anything about him; he to me is but a man like any other citizen; but what is the case? The Supreme Court of the United States in a railroad case denounced the purchase of a certain railroad as a fraud, said that the effect of the purchase was a fraud. Ludeling, acting for himself and sixteen or eighteen other corporators of that railroad, bid it off for some nominal sum; $30,000 perhaps. The Supreme Court said that was a fraud. He, acting for himself and as attorney for others, bid off at a nominal rate a railroad that had been dismantled, broken up, according to his statement, and which was not worth more than that. I know nothing about the facts. In the presence of his associates who were democrats, the other day before the Senate committee in New Orleans, he said this man and that man, pointing them out, leading men around there, leading democrats, had been associated with him in the transaction. Ludeling's statement was that there was not a rail, there was not a building, there was not a depot belonging to this railroad company; and he, buying for himself and others, bid it off. The Supreme Court characterized the purchase as a fraud. It was not so regarded by him nor by the others who made this purchase; and if he is to be denounced, why not denounce all the other men concerned? Why were they not all guilty? Why single out Ludeling as a rascal? Why do you not denounce all the persons engaged in the purchase as rascals, thieves, &c.?

Mr. President, there are other judges of that supreme court of Louisiana who would adorn any tribunal. There was one who told me he was a native of the State and had always lived there, and, so far as I heard, he was spoken of as a man of the highest character. I do not now recall his name with certainty, but I think it was Morgan. Ludeling is a native of that region.

Mr. WEST. Judge Morgan is not now a judge of the supreme court.

Mr. SHERMAN. He was?

Mr. WEST. Yes.

Mr. SHERMAN. He was until recently a judge of the supreme court of Louisiana. All these men are men of high character and standing. To arraign all these people in this way, it seems to me, is very wrong, and the Senator will regret it. The truth is that so much is my friend imbittered in relation to matters down there that he has fallen into the common error of supposing that every republican is a rascal and a thief. If you want to compare the record and conduct and character of republicans and democrats over this broad country of ours, we could make the comparison very easily. The truth is the few white republicans comparatively in Louisiana deserve credit for courage, for honor in many cases. I do not know but that there are some rascals among them, and there are some rascals among the democrats, I imagine; but they have stood by the rights of the humble and the lowly, by the poor negro who has been armed with political rights. They have stood by them while these men have endeavored to oppress him and deprive him of those rights. There are good men down South; there are native-born citizens there who swore to those outrages, and among the rest a man named Hammond, who told a plain, straight story, who said that he was now cultivating the land that he had owned before the war and employing the very men who had been his slaves before the war. He testified to these same enormities.

It is not in this way that you can discredit these witnesses. So far as I could judge, they swore to the truth. Among them were officers of the Army of the highest standing. My friend has not called General Brooks a liar or a thief or a scoundrel. The other day my friend abused one of the returning board as keeping a doggery or grocery. The truth is that he keeps an eating-house. If all the men in the democratic party in the city of New York who keep a doggery or an eating-house or anything of that kind were turned out as rascals and thieves and scoundrels, I am afraid that the democratic majority would fade away; and not only so there, but in a great many other places. It will not do to make such tests. We have been told of a man who keeps a snake show. I hardly know what that is. He shows big snakes, I suppose.

Mr. BOGY. No; little snakes.

Mr. SHERMAN. Because he keeps snakes and little snakes at that, therefore he is a rascal! Did my friend see the snakes? Somebody said he kept snakes. In that way witnesses are discredited. One man kept a doggery or eating-house, and therefore he could not act. Another man was an undertaker and he could not be respectable. Because he buried the dead that was not a creditable business. Nobody can be respectable except he is a democrat and in favor of hunting poor negroes in their cabins. These "regulators" can come up and testify and there is nothing to their discredit. O, no, they are gentlemen! Mr. President, that mode of discrediting witnesses will not answer even in Missouri, even in Saint Louis, where they have a large, flourishing, growing population and a fine city. Men may pursue humble avocations; they may have been slaves and may be ignorant; they may not be able to read or write; but in many cases they can tell God's truth without error as plainly and as well as anybody else. And often it is that the most ignorant witness is the most honest witness. We have often heard it said that the poorest witness in the world is a lawyer, whose acuteness and intellect and culture and education sometimes make him ramble all over the field instead of telling squarely a plain, straight story. It has often been said that a lawyer is the poorest witness because he scatters and goes over the field too much.

Sir, these men are not to be discredited in that way, nor the supreme court of Louisiana, nor Governor Packard; and even that poor fellow who shows snakes may be an honest, good man, or he may be a dishonest rascal; but he is not dishonest simply because he shows snakes or because he is a republican, because he is a governor or because he is a judge of the supreme court of Louisiana. That kind of argument will not do in the Senate of the United States.

How does my friend now with all his long array of facts meet the fact that in East Feliciana there was no republican vote? How does he meet all the outrages that were almost numberless in the testimony that I have read? Calling men to say that they did not see it, that they were not present, negative testimony of that kind, amounts to nothing; but that is the way we have been answered throughout. Whenever we bring forward a witness there is nothing read out of that book to contradict the witness, but he is a thief, he shows snakes, he is a rascal, the worst man in the country! That is the way they are "whistled down the wind." It will not do, sir. The sad facts are recorded in imperishable history and they cannot be erased by such arguments as these. The Senator may say that his speech will be read. Let it be read and I am perfectly willing to let the record that I have presented, which was nothing but the testimony of living witnesses, stand with it; let the two go together and let honest men read them, and I have no doubt what will be their judgment as to the condition of affairs in Louisiana.

Mr. BOGY. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio has often tried that on me before, to put in my mouth words and arguments which I have not used. I did not deny but that statements or, as he calls them, protests had been filed in regard to the so-called bull-dozed parishes. I made no such denial. I denied that they were sent from the parishes in accordance with the requirements of law. I did not deny that, as he calls them, protests were filed before the returning board, but I said those protests which the law calls "statements" were made in New Orleans after the election in violation of law. I do deny that not in one of these parishes were they sent as required by the law. That is my denial, and he well understands me. I do not deny but that in his book of testimony these statements appear and in good form. I admit they are formally written, but written and made when and where the law did not authorize them to be made. That is what I said.

Now, sir, a word with regard to this man Ludeling; here is what the Supreme Court says:

> Horne was persuaded by Ludeling, and without any communication with his constituents, to enter into an agreement, which was made on the 2d of February, 1868, one day before the sale. The material part of this agreement was that Gordon—

The agreement reveals apprehension that the sale might be stopped by injunction or declared null and void. It was signed "John T. Ludeling, for himself and friends," and "J. U. Horne, for himself and friends," and it is proved that when it was entered into Ludeling was informed of Horne's mission and of the plan he was instructed to carry out.

> It is impossible to characterize this agreement as anything else than fraudulent. Its obvious purpose was to remove competition at the sale. It was a flagrant breach of trust on the part of Horne and it was a fraud in Ludeling, with knowledge of the trust Horne had undertaken, to persuade him to violate his instructions and sacrifice the interests of his constituents, himself becoming a party to the violation.—Jackson vs. Ludeling, 21 Wallace Reports, pages 628 and 629.

And in that way he stole the railroad. A man who has been so held up by the Supreme Court of the United States is not fit to be the chief-justice of this State of Louisiana or any other State. It will not do to say that Ludeling denies this thing. Of course he does; but can anybody believe that the Supreme Court of the United States would put such things down in their decision unless the proof had been beyond all possibility of doubt? We know how prudent and careful they are; we know that they will not hold up a man to the world to be a rogue or a fraud unless the proof is conclusive and beyond all doubt. The Supreme Court has passed on him—and I submit to this decision—and I am compelled to believe him to be a rascal, however much he may deny it or the Senator from Ohio. I was therefore justified in saying at the outset that this man is infamous and unworthy of being chief-justice of a State. I will tell the Senator that he does me injustice when he says that I am disposed to look upon men as unworthy who are keepers of saloons and eating-houses. I said nothing of this kind. All men have my highest regard who are honest, regardless what may be their calling. As on the other hand, I do not care how high a man may stand officially, if he is a rogue and I am called upon to pass on him, I will say "he is a rogue."

Mr. MORTON. I regretted, Mr. President, to hear what the Senator from Missouri said in regard to Governor Packard, of Louisiana; and I speak of this with the more freedom because Mr. Packard, so far as I know, is not my friend, and I am under no possible personal or political obligation to him. But I have been somewhat conversant with the affairs of Louisiana for several years past and think I know what is the character of Governor Packard, of that State, not only as a politician, but a man in society and in business. I have never before heard Governor Packard accused of being a man of bad character. I have understood that democrats there as well as republicans regarded him as a substantial, honest man, a man of good character; and in all the jobs we heard spoken of as having been got up in Louisiana the last few years I never heard it stated that Governor Packard was concerned or interested in any of them. I believe that he is a man of good character; and I heard with regret the Senator from Missouri say here that he was a man of infamous character and an infamous public robber.

But, Mr. President, it comes in illustration of what has occurred so often in the South in the last few years, and is now being practiced, and that is that every leading white republican almost is assailed, his character is covered with obloquy and shame; and here is a fair illustration. A man who, I believe, has been elected governor of Louisiana, who has long been the United States marshal for that State, a man of good character, is denounced in the Senate of the United States as being an infamous public robber. Why, Mr. President, what are we to think of the opinions of the Senator from Missouri? I am not going to call his sincerity in question; I have no personal issue with him; but what are we to think of his opinions, of the justice of his views in regard to anything, or in regard to anybody, when he can stand up here and make this broad, sweeping statement against Governor Packard? And the Senator says here that the people of Louisiana, as shown by their history, have been a law-abiding people. He denies the truth of these statements in regard to the outrages, the murders, and the violence that have taken place in that State for some years back. He says the testimony is false and perjured and is not entitled to credit. Why, sir, have we got to that period in the world's history that human testimony is to be entirely discredited, that there is no such thing as truth, and that vast bodies of men can be found from year to year, without interest, without inducement, without anything to gain by it, who will be found to swear falsely and take perjury to their souls, and before the law?

Why, Mr. President, in 1866 a massacre took place at the Mechanics' Institute in the city of New Orleans. A body of men had assembled as a constitutional convention to propose amendments to the constitution of the State. It was peaceable, and, as they believed, was assembled in accordance with law. They had a right to be there; they molested nobody; but an attack was made upon them at the hour of noon, and in large part by the police of the city; an attack that was connived at, and in part engaged in, by prominent politicians; and in less than thirty minutes nearly two hundred men were killed and wounded in cold blood. The matter was examined by a committee of the House of Representatives. Nearly one hundred depositions were taken of men of all parties, white and black, men who had no inducement under God's heaven to swear to lies; and such fearful lies as they would have been, if their statements had not been true. You cannot read that narrative to-day without your blood curdling; horrible in its atrocity and inhumanity.

Then you come down two years later after Louisiana had been reconstructed. An election was held there in the month of May, under the auspices of an officer of the United States Army and under the protection of the United States Army. At that election in May the republican party carried the State by 16,000 majority, nearly 17,000. Then this protection was withdrawn; the State government started out, and an election was held in November following for President and for some State officers. Some ninety days before that election in November, societies were organized in the State of Louisiana and great violence was committed. A committee sent down next winter took nearly two hundred depositions, and by them it was proven that within sixty days before the November election in 1868 more than two thousand men were killed and wounded for political purposes. Some of the most terrible slaughters ever known were committed there. There were about two hundred men killed at one time and in one place. These facts were established by many scores of witnesses having no connection with each other, having no possible interest, no earthly inducement to testify to these atrocious perjuries, such as they would have been if these stories were not true. There you find the evidence in the result that, whereas the republicans carried Louisiana by 16,000 in May, the democrats carried it by 40,000 in November; and in parishes where the republicans had hundreds and even thousands of votes in May, General Grant did not get a vote in November, or got five votes or a very small number of votes. Such changes can only be accounted for by violence. Men are not converted unanimously; you cannot find a whole neighborhood converted to democracy or to republicanism in a moment or in a day. Political changes do go on sometimes; men change from one side to the other; but never in the world have I known a case where every man in a county or parish has gone over from one party to the other. Such things never occur unless the conversions are made as Mohammed made conversions, by the sword.

Then coming down to 1873, passing by the individual acts of violence in the mean time that have been abundantly proven from time to time, you find the Colfax massacre; nearly or quite one hundred colored men killed in cold blood; one of the most terrible narratives that have been written in modern times; and, if you will just refer to the trials in the circuit court of the United States at New Orleans, you will find that the judge of the court in one of those trials in giving his charge to the jury made a recital of the facts, which was conceded to be true by the counsel on both sides, and in which he described that horrible massacre in terms that I cannot repeat; giving to it a description and a character conceded to be correct by the counsel on both sides, making it one of the most terrible things in our history.

Passing down a little later we come to the Coushatta massacre, which has been established by evidence. I might refer to other transactions on the Red River, saying nothing about the riots in the city of New Orleans that have occurred from time to time and have been abundantly established by evidence. And yet we are told that this is all perjury, it is all false; that the people of Louisiana have been a law-abiding people, and that republicans, by perjury, and by fraud, by larceny, and every kind of crime, have sought to obtain the power.

Now I want to call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to a witness that he cannot discredit in that way, and that is in reference to this last election. I will just take a single case as shown by the record and I should like to hear how that is to be explained. I will take the parish of East Feliciana as shown at the last election. The registration of East Feliciana stood in 1876 as follows: colored 2,127; white 1,004. At the election before this, in 1874, East Feliciana gave 847 democratic votes and 1,688 republican votes. At this last presidential election East Feliciana gave 1,740 democratic votes and not one republican vote. There is a paper witness, established by the record, that cannot be met by the general charge of perjury and misrepresentation. In this single parish not one republican vote was returned. How was that brought about? Was it brought about by conversion, by democratic arguments, by men voluntarily changing their minds? O, no! nobody believes that. A result like that cannot be produced by any other means than intimidation and violence, and it was a complete result. There were others approaching it; not quite so complete in their character, but others approached it. There you find evidence that cannot be put down by saying "it is all manufactured testimony."

You may take the returns in Mississippi and you will find the same kind of evidence. I can take the returns of the last election in Mississippi and I think refer to four counties in which in 1875 there were over four thousand republican votes, bad as that election was, and yet at this last election Hayes got less than twenty-five votes in those four counties. I can take, I think, counties in Georgia, and several of them, if my memory is not at fault at least half a dozen, in which Hayes did not get a vote in 1876; and I can take counties in Alabama upon the official returns and there find that Hayes either got no vote at all or a very small vote, where the evidence was abundant that there were hundreds and thousands of republicans. Sir, this kind of evidence cannot be put away by saying "It is all perjury, it is all manufactured, the work of carpet-baggers and scalawags, and the ignorant negroes who are made to sign what they do not understand or know anything about."

I did not intend, Mr. President, to have adverted to this matter this afternoon; but the remarks of the Senator from Missouri in regard to Mr. Packard seemed to me to be such a common and complete illustration of the course that is pursued toward southern republicans that I must be forgiven for having intruded thus long.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President——

Mr. BOGY. One word in reply.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, this discussion has gone on pro and con here all day long, and I think we ought to be allowed to adjourn.

Mr. BOGY. Just one remark.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There has been no personal reflection on my friend from Missouri. If there was I should certainly yield to him; but as it has been merely fair debate, I do not feel called on to allow it to go on longer.

Mr. BOGY. I wish but a minute of time.

Mr. WINDOM. I should like to make a conference report.

Mr. BOGY. I will not occupy more than a moment. I only want to explain this thing about East Feliciana.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You can explain it to-morrow. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. WINDOM. Will the Senator withdraw the motion for a moment?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir, if the Senator will renew it.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. R. No. 4) authorizing Captain Temple and Lieutenant-Commander Whiting, of the Navy, to accept a decoration from the King of the Hawaiian Islands.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 4307) making appropriations to supply certain deficiencies in the contingent fund of the House of Representatives, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 2234) for the relief of Henry Simons, late private in Company D, Fourth Regiment Iowa Infantry Volunteers; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

DEFICIENCIES IN APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. WINDOM submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 4307) making appropriations to supply certain deficiencies in the contingent fund of the House of Representatives, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 14, and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the amendment numbered 12, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 7, and agree to the same amended as follows: Strike out all of said amendment after the word "of," in line 3 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "$1,200 per annum, $1,264.17," and the Senate agree to the same.

WM. WINDOM,
W. B. ALLISON,
R. E. WITHERS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
CHAS. FOSTER,
WM. S. HOLMAN,
J. H. BLOUNT,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 2234) for the relief of Henry Simons, late private in Company D, Fourth Regiment Iowa Infantry Volunteers, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. WINDOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After six minutes spent in executive session the doors were re-opened, and (at four o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SUFFRAGE FOR WOMEN.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is apprised that gentlemen from many States of the Union desire to present this morning petitions asking a constitutional amendment prohibiting the several States from disfranchising citizens on account of sex. The Chair asks unanimous consent that such petitions may be presented now. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. KASSON presented a petition from Janet Strong, R. J. Andrews, N. R. Allen, and others—226 men and 449 women—675 citizens of the State of Iowa, asking for a sixteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibiting the several States from disfranchising United States citizens on account of sex; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. KASSON. These petitions are all alike in form, I suggest that one of them be read. It occupies but four lines in print.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

The undersigned citizens of the United States, residents of the State of Iowa, earnestly pray your honorable bodies to adopt measures for so amending the Constitution as to prohibit the several States from disfranchising United States citizens on account of sex.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to inform the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] that the Committee on the Judiciary have already agreed to report a bill providing for the admission of women to practice in the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. KASSON. That is a different subject-matter.

Mr. BANKS presented a petition of Mrs. A. G. Riddle, R. J. Meigs, Frederick Douglass, Mary F. Foster, and others—310 men and 438 women—748 citizens of the District of Columbia, asking for a sixteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibiting the several States from disfranchising United States citizens on account of sex; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Hurn, Charles Butler, and others—66 men and 136 women—202 citizens of the State of New Jersey, asking for a sixteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibiting the several States from disfranchising United States citizens on account of sex; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HOAR, by unanimous consent, presented the petition of Julie B. Hunt, E. S. Hammond, A. P. Lillie, and others—76 men and 127 women—203 citizens of the State of Massachusetts, asking for a sixteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibiting the several States from disfranchising United States citizens on account of sex; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HALE, by unanimous consent, presented the petition of Lucy A. Snow, O. S. Hix, and others—52 men and 76 women—128 citizens of the State of Maine, asking for a sixteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibiting the several States from disfranchising United States citizens on account of sex; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HOLMAN, by unanimous consent, presented the petition of Edward S. Pope, Jesse W. Weill, Mrs. J. H. Parker and others—43 men and 35 women—78 citizens of the State of Indiana, asking for a sixteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibiting the several States from disfranchising United States citizens on account of sex; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, a similar petition to those already presented has been left at the desk of my colleague [Mr. MORRISON] who is absent from the city on the business of the House, and there being no objection I will present it in his behalf.

There was no objection.

Mr. SPRINGER, by unanimous consent, presented the petition of Clara Lyon Peters, Hannah Coffee, L. F. Sawyer, and others—240 men and 339 women—579 citizens of the State of Illinois, asking for a sixteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibiting the several States from disfranchising United States citizens on account of sex; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LAPHAM, by unanimous consent, presented the petition of Henry R. Selden, Helen M. Loder, Mary A. Calkins, Mary S. Anthony, and others—216 men and 385 women—601 citizens of the State of New York, asking for a sixteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibiting the several States from disfranchising United States citizens on account of sex; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MORGAN, by unanimous consent, presented the petition of Annie R. Irwin, Charlotte Curtis, Virginia W. Mason, and others—62 men and 88 women—150 citizens of the State of Missouri, asking for a sixteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibiting the several States from disfranchising United States citizens on account of sex; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. KNOTT, by unanimous consent, presented the petition of Ann L. Quinby, Warren Smith, and 96 other citizens—35 men and 61 women—asking a sixteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibiting the several States from disfranchising United States citizens on account of sex; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. FENN, by unanimous consent, presented the petition of Alida C. Avery, N. W. Smith, and others—15 men and 12 women—27 citizens of the State of Colorado, asking for a sixteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibiting the several States from disfranchising United States citizens on account of sex; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPEAL OF WAR TAXES UPON BANKS.

Mr. CONGER, by unanimous consent, presented the petition of W. L. Bancroft, Henry Howard, and 118 citizens of Saint Clair County, Michigan, praying for the repeal of the war taxes upon banks and banking capital in the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

CHEAP TELEGRAPHING.

Mr. WAIT, by unanimous consent, presented the petition of C. Hunt and 73 others, citizens of Connecticut, asking for cheap telegraphing; which was referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

MR. ORTON DISCHARGED FROM CUSTODY.

Mr HUNTON. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report to the House the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That William Orton, now held in custody by the Sergeant-at-Arms of this House, be discharged from said custody.

Mr. HUNTON. I ask to have the report of the committee which accompanies that resolution read for the information of the House. It is very short.

The Clerk read as follows:

That they find from the proof before them that at the time and since the service of the subpœna upon him the condition of Mr. Orton's health has been such that it would have probably imperiled his life or at least postponed his recovery, to have made the journey to the city of New Orleans when he was requested to appear; and that for that reason he should not be held in contempt for failing to make his personal appearance at the time and place designated.

It further appears that at the time of the service of the subpœna upon him, and since, Mr Orton has not had actual possession of the dispatches demanded with the present capacity to produce them so as to bring him within the rule laid down by Lord Ellenborough in Amey vs. Long, 9 East, 473, indorsed by the House in the recent matter of E. W. Barnes. They therefore recommend that said Orton be discharged from custody.

Mr. HUNTON. I now demand the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. HUNTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RIVAL GOVERNMENTS IN LOUISIANA.

Mr. ELLIS. I ask unanimous consent to offer for reference to the Committee on the Judiciary a resolution, asking from the President all information in regard to the rival governments in Louisiana.

Mr. HURLBUT. Not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. Under the rules, anything that comes in by unanimous consent cannot be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PORTNER & RICKER.

Mr. BLISS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4461) for the relief of Portner & Ricker, of Alexandria, Virginia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

COURTS IN ARKANSAS AND OTHER STATES.

Mr. McCRARY, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back the bill (S. No. 155) to amend sections 533, 556, 571, and 572 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to courts in Arkansas and other States, with a House amendment, and moved that the House recede from its amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. McCRARY moved to reconsider the vote by which the House receded from its amendment to the bill; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOHN W. L. MATLOCK.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4462) to refund to John W. L. Matlock, of Indianapolis, Indiana, the sum of $754.55, wrongfully collected from him by the collector of internal revenue of Clark County, Indiana, March 24, 1865, with interest on the same from that date; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

PAY OF CLERK OF COMMITTEE.

Mr. DOUGLAS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read and referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations inquire into the propriety of paying the salary to the clerk of the Select Committee to Investigate the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company at the same rate of pay and in the same manner as other committee-clerks of this House.

ELIZABETH CARSON.

Mr. JOHN REILLY, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back the bill (S. No. 973) for the relief of Elizabeth Carson; and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the same, and it was referred to the Committee on War Claims, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

JOHN MILLER.

Mr. WATTERSON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4463) for the relief of John Miller, of Bourbon County, Kentucky; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN S. LOGAN AND W. L. SHADWICK.

Mr. BRIGHT, by unanimous consent, from the Committee of Claims, reported back the bill (S. No. 890) for the relief of John S. Logan and W. L. Shadwick; and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the same, and it was referred to the Committee on War Claims, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

DANIEL LEWIS.

Mr. CLYMER, by unanimous consent, submitted a resolution authorizing the payment of Daniel Lewis for services rendered in the Doorkeeper's department; which was referred to the Committee on Accounts.

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENTS—WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. EAMES, by unanimous consent, presented the petition of Catharine Cornell Knowles, John C. Nichols, and others—56 men and 70 women—126 citizens of the State of Rhode Island, asking for a sixteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibiting the several States from disfranchising United States citizens on account of sex; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A. P. FRICK.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4464) to authorize the President of the United States to appoint A. P. Frick an assistant surgeon in the United States Army; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

JACKSON T. SORRELLS.

Mr. VANCE of North Carolina, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4465) for the relief of Jackson T. Sorrells, of North Carolina; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

FEES OF ATTORNEYS AND CLAIM AGENTS.

Mr. BAGBY, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4466) to regulate the fees of attorneys and claim agents in certain cases and to amend sections 4768, 4785, and 4786 of the Revised Statutes; which was read a first and second time, recommitted to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

THEODORE TEED.

Mr. HUNTON, by unanimous consent introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4467) for the relief of Theodore Teed; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PAGE. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called, the morning hour begins at twenty minutes to one o'clock, and the business of the morning hour, this being Friday, is the call of committees for reports of a private nature.

WILLIAM TABB.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, from the Committee on War Claims, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4468) for the relief of William Tabb, of Spotsylvania, Virginia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS IN NEW MEXICO.

Mr. JOYCE, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 3112) to confirm a private land claim in the Territory of New Mexico; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

Mr. JOYCE also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4469) to confirm private land claims in the Territory of New Mexico; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CHARLES E. HEDGES.

Mr. BOONE. I am directed by the Committee on Indian Affairs to report back, with a favorable recommendation, Senate bill No. 294, for the relief of Charles E. Hedges. I ask that this bill may be put upon its passage at this time.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which objections will be in order.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Charles E. Hedges $11,329, in full payment for supplies furnished by him to the Yankton Indians, at the request of the United States Indian agent, to prevent starvation among said Indians during the winter of 1866 and 1867, as found by the Interior Department and reported to Congress January 17, 1871, said sum to be re-imbursed to the Treasury of the United States out of annuities due and to become due to said Indians.

Mr. ATKINS. That bill makes an appropriation. Is it not required by the rule that it should receive its first consideration in Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman make that point of order?

Mr. ATKINS. I do.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The bill was accordingly referred to the Committe of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

JOHN W. SKILES.

Mr. BANNING, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 4111) for the relief of John W. Skiles, and moved that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on War Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. JOHN REILLY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported adversely upon the following; which were laid upon the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. No. 2795) for an appropriation to repair the military bridge over the Big Sioux River, near Sioux City, in the State of Iowa; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 17) to correct the Army records and registry of Lieutenant George D. Hill.

DISPOSITION OF UNITED STATES TROOPS.

Mr. JOHN REILLY. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report for consideration and adoption at this time the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be, and they are hereby, directed to inquire and report to this House what, if any, removals are now being made of arms and munitions of war from arsenals in one section of the country to another; the object and reason thereof; the present strength and location of the troops of the United States Army; what changes, if any, have been made within the last sixty days of those troops; how many, if any, have been withdrawn from the frontier; also if the frontier is left with a sufficient number of troops for its protection; the number of troops located in and around Washington; the object of collecting troops here; by whose order the changes of location of the troops and munitions of war have been and are being made; and that the committee have power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. HURLBUT. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. HURLBUT. My point of order is that during the call of committees for reports of a private nature this resolution is not in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order, and the resolution is not before the House.

WILLIAM A. RUCKER.

Mr. THORNBURGH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4470) for the relief of William A. Rucker, late second lieutenant Company B, Third Regiment North Carolina Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. THORNBURGH. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom were referred sundry petitions and also a bill, to report them back and ask that the committee be discharged from their further consideration, and that they be laid upon the table, provision having been made in other bills for the purpose:

Accordingly the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the following, and they were laid on the table:

A bill (S. No. 1008) to increase the efficiency of the cavalry force in the suppression of Sioux Indian hostilities; and Sundry petitions for the passage of a soldiers' bounty-land law.

Mr. STRAIT, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back adversely the following resolutions, bills, petitions, &c.; which were severally laid on the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

Resolution relative to ordering troops from Fort Union to Colfax, New Mexico;

A bill (H. R. No. 4353) for the relief of Peter D. Ranke, late private of Company C, Fourteenth Regiment Pennsylvania Cavalry Volunteers;

Petition of T. Worthington, late colonel Forty-sixth Ohio Infantry Volunteers, for investigation into the charges on which he was dismissed the volunteer service;

Petition of William K. Griffith, for additional bounty;

Claim of John S. Horner, one of the heirs of Dr. Gustavus B. Horner, of the revolutionary war;

A bill (H. R. No. 412) for the relief of Charles Edwards;

A bill (H. R. No. 2574) for the relief of Louisa G. Chandler;

A bill (H. R. No. 2995) for the relief of Mrs. Mary J. Eddy;

A bill (H. R. No. 2413) for the relief of Rufus Ross;

A bill (H. R. No. 3153) for the relief of Joseph W. Parish;

A bill (H. R. No. 1262) for the relief of Mary A. Silvey;

A bill (H. R. No. 159) for the relief of Samuel J. Hanway;

A bill (H. R. No. 3554) for the relief of William L. Lenan, late first lieutenant, Company B, Thirty-eighth Indiana Volunteers;

A bill (H. R. No. 2085) for the relief of Samuel Coday;

A bill (H. R. No. 3647) to remove the charge of desertion against Harman Colley;

A bill (H. R. No. 4225) for the relief of Peter W. Taylor, late lieutenant-colonel Fortieth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Cavalry;

A bill (H. R. No. 2538) for the relief of John Bowles, late lieutenant-colonel Seventy-ninth Regiment United States Colored Troops;

Petition of Robert K. Byrd, late colonel First Regiment Tennessee Infantry Volunteers, asking pay for a horse lost in the service;

A bill (H. R. No. 1732) for the relief of John Chandler; and

A petition of Charles Upson, with proposed amendment, concerning the law affecting the organization of the Army.

HENRY SIMONS.

Mr. STRAIT, from the same committee, reported back, with a recommendation that it pass, the bill (H. R. No. 2234) for the relief of Henry Simons, late private in Company D, Fourth Regiment Iowa Infantry Volunteers.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay, out of any money not otherwise appropriated, to Henry Simons, late private in Company D, Fourth Regiment Iowa Infantry Volunteers, $100 as bounty due for enlistment under the proclamation of the President of May 3, 1861, and the orders from the War Department issued in pursuance thereof, he having subsequently been honorably discharged.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STRAIT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RICHARD H. BIRMINGHAM.

Mr. COOK, from the same committee, reported back the petition of Richard H. Birmingham, for bounty, and moved that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. COOK also, from the same committee, reported back adversely the following bills; which were severally laid on the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. No. 759) for the relief of William Shelton and Wiley Gasnell;

A bill (H. R. No. 213) to fix the brevet and real rank of officers of the regular and volunteer Army, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 70) for the relief of Jacob Dice, of Fountain County, Indiana; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4256) for the relief of A. W. Greely, Fifth Cavalry.

DR. GEORGE M'COY.

Mr. BANNING, from the same committee, reported back the petition of Dr. George McCoy, acting assistant surgeon United States Army, for a pension, on account of disability incurred in the line of his duty, and moved that the committee be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

LEGAL REPRESENTATIVES OF JOHN W. GALL.

Mr. JOHN REILLY, from the same committee, reported back adversely a bill of the following title; which, with an amendment of the Senate thereto, was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. No. 262) for the relief of the legal representatives of John W. Gall, deceased, late of Company A, One hundred and thirtieth Regiment Illinois Volunteers.

DAHLGREN CLAIM.

Mr. LEWIS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported as a substitute for House bill No. 975 a bill (H. R. No. 4471) authorizing the settlement of the claim of the estate of the late Rear-Admiral John A. Dahlgren; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

FREDERICK R. SMITH.

Mr. WILLIS, from the same committee, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 4336) for the relief of Frederick R. Smith, with the recommendation that it do pass; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM H. CORNELL.

Mr. WILLIS also, from the same comittee, reported back adversely a bill (H. R. No. 2222) for the relief of William H. Cornell, late acting third assistant engineer of the United States steamer Winnebago; and the same was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. BURLEIGH, from the same committee, reported back adversely in the following cases; which were laid on the table:

A bill (H. R. No. 2553) for the relief of Rufus P. Tryon, surgeon United States Navy;

A bill (H. R. No. 3234) to restore William J. Montgomery, late first assistant engineer United States Navy, to the active list of the Navy;

A bill (H. R. No. 1829) for the relief of Alexander H. Wallis, George Russell, and Henry Russell;

A bill (H. R. No. 2578) to require the construction of paymasters' offices on all naval vessels; and

The memorial of J. W. Gardner, passed assistant engineer in the United States Navy, praying that his pay in his present grade may commence at the time the vacancy occurs to which he was promoted.

NAVAL OFFICERS ALLOWED TO ACCEPT DECORATIONS.

Mr. BURLEIGH also, from the same committee, reported back a joint resolution (S. R. No. 4) authorizing Captain Temple and Lieutenant Commander Whiting, of the Navy, to accept a decoration from the King of the Hawaiian Islands, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The joint resolution authorizes Captain William G. Temple and Lieutenant-Commander William H. Whiting, of the United States Navy, to accept the cross of officers of the Order of Kamehameha I, conferred upon them by the King of the Hawaiian Islands as evidence of His Majesty's appreciation of those officers in connection with his visit to Washington, District of Columbia.

Mr. BURLEIGH demanded the previous question.

Mr. KASSON. May I ask whether this involves a title or not; whether in accepting this cross of officers of the Order of King Kamehameha they also accept titles? If it does involve the acceptance of a title, I cannot support the bill.

Mr. BURLEIGH. It is merely, as I understand, a medal of honor.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 31, noes 12; no quorum voting.

Mr. BLAND demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. BURLEIGH and Mr. BLAND were appointed.

The House again divided: and the tellers reported—ayes 92, noes 60.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was ordered to be now put; and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, and it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. BUCKNER. I should like to ask what active services these officers of the Navy did to this King of the Hawaiian Islands?

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. O'BRIEN demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the joint resolution.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 21, noes 125.

So (one-fifth of those present not having voted in the affirmative,) the yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. BLAND demanded a division on the passage of the joint resolution.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 108, noes 42.

So the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. BURLEIGH moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was adopted, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

Mr. HOLMAN. This is so ridiculous a proposition that I must demand the yeas and nays on the motion to lay upon the table, so we may have a record.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 112, nays 106, not voting 71; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Bagby, William H. Baker, Banks, Bliss, Bradley, Burleigh, Carr, Caswell, Conger, Cox, Crapo, Davis, Davy, Denison, Dibrell, Dobbins, Dunnell, Durham, Eames, Eden, Evans, Flye, Fort, Franklin, Frye, Garfield, Gause, Goode, Goodin, Gunter, Hale, Hancock, Benjamin W. Wiley Wells, Wheeler, White, Whitehouse, Whiting, Wigginton, Andrew Williams, James Williams, and Woodburn—71.

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

During the roll-call,

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri, stated that his colleague, Mr. GLOVER, was confined to his room by sickness.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. SNIFFEN, one of his secretaries, who further announced that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. No. 4281) to amend an act entitled "An act authorizing the repavement of Pennsylvania avenue," and the act amendatory thereof;

An act (H. R. No. 4120) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensioners of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1878; and

An act (H. R. No. 1237) for the relief of Benjamin F. Reynolds.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BRIGHT and Mr. WELLS addressed the chair.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. BRIGHT. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Missouri rise?

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. I desire to move that the House resolve itself into Committe of the Whole House on the state of the Union, to consider the Indian appropriation bill.

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT—WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. KELLEY. Pending those motions, I ask unanimous consent to present the petition of Caroline S. Broomall and others—249 men and 314 women—563 citizens of the State of Pennsylvania, asking for a sixteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibiting the several States from disfranchising United States citizens on account of sex, for reference to the Committee on the Judiciary.

There was no objection, and the petition was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. W. B. WILLIAMS. I ask unanimous consent to present the petition of C. U. Church and others—181 men and 248 women—429 citizens of the State of Michigan, asking for a sixteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibiting the several States from disfranchising United States citizens on account of sex, for reference to the Committee on the Judiciary.

There was no objection, and the petition was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

RECUSANT WITNESSES—J. MADISON WELLS AND THOMAS C. ANDERSON.

Mr. LYNDE. The Sergeant-at-Arms is ready to present at the bar the witnesses arraigned for contempt of the authority of the House in refusing to obey a subpœna of the Louisiana committee.

The SERGEANT-AT-ARMS, (JOHN G. THOMPSON, esq.,) appeared at the bar and said:

Mr. Speaker, in obedience to the orders of the House, I have arrested and have now at the bar of the House the witnesses J. Madison Wells and Thomas C. Anderson, of Louisiana.

The SPEAKER. The Sergeant-at-Arms reports that he has now at the bar of the House J. Madison Wells and Thomas C. Anderson, of Louisiana, who, by a resolution of the House of the 17th of January, were ordered to be brought to its bar.

It is the duty of the Chair, Mr. Wells, to ask you what excuse you have to offer for your failure to appear before a committee of this House sitting in the city of New Orleans, Louisiana, on the 12th day of December, 1876, and to produce before the said committee certain books and papers called for in the subpœna duces tecum duly served upon you. It is also the duty of the Chair, Mr. Anderson, to ask you what excuse you have to offer for your failure to appear before a committee of this House sitting in the city of New Orleans, Louisiana, on the 12th day of December, 1876, and to produce before said committee certain books and papers called for in the subpœna duces tecum duly served upon you?

J. MADISON WELLS, (a witness.) I would ask the indulgence of the House until the other members of the board reach here, that we may make our answer together, remaining in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms until they arrive.

The SPEAKER. The witness J. Madison Wells asks further time to make his answer, until the arrival of the two remaining members of the returning board.

Mr. LYNDE. Before any action is taken by the House, I would ask that the other witness may answer the interrogatory propounded by the Speaker.

THOMAS C. ANDERSON, (a witness.) I make the same answer as J. Madison Wells, and make the same request.

Mr. LYNDE. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk, and on it call the previous question.

Resolved, That the report of the Louisiana investigating committee in relation to the refusal of J. Madison Wells and Thomas C. Anderson to obey a supœna duces tecum, and the answer of said witnesses just made at the bar of the House, be referred to the Judiciary Committee with instructions to report upon the same at as early a day as practicable; and the said J. Madison Wells and Thomas C. Anderson in the mean time to remain in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House.

Mr. HOAR. I ask the gentleman from Wisconsin to permit me to make a suggestion before he insists on the demand for the previous question.

Mr. LYNDE. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. As I understand it, the witnesses desire to make a further answer concerning the action of the board of which they are members when the other members of that board, who are expected daily in Washington, arrive. The resolution refers the report of the committee and this answer to a committee of this House with directions to report thereon as early as practicable; the result of which is to refer to the Judiciary Committee the case, when the witnesses at the bar have not made their answer, but desire time to make it. I suggest to my friend from Wisconsin, therefore, that he should add to his resolution the words "together with such further answer as the witnesses may hereafter be permitted to make."

Mr. LYNDE. I think that is a proper subject for consideration by the Committee on the Judiciary, and I therefore prefer that the resolution should be adopted as presented to the House.

Mr. HOAR. The witnesses have made no answer; they have made a request for time to answer. This resolution refers to the Committee on the Judiciary the "answer" of the witnesses, and directs that committee to report upon it. There is no difference in principle, I presume, between the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LYNDE] and myself.

Mr. LYNDE. I am willing to modify the resolution by striking out the word "answer" and inserting the word "request."

Mr. HOAR. Very well; that will be sufficient.

The SPEAKER. If no objection be made, the resolution will be modified as suggested.

No objection was made, and the resolution was modified accordingly.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution, as modified, was adopted.

Mr. LYNDE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, a bill of the following title:

A bill (H. R. No. 4251) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1878, and for other purposes.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BRIGHT. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, the Chair will state the question before the House. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BRIGHT] moves that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar. Pending that motion the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WELLS] moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of considering the Indian appropriation bill. This being Friday, and private-bill day, the question will first be taken upon the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BRIGHT,] that motion taking precedence on private-bill day.

Mr. BUCKNER. Pending that motion, I ask that all debate in Committee of the Whole upon the pending bill, being the bill for the relief of the mission of Saint James, in Washington Territory, shall be limited to fifteen minutes.

The motion to limit debate was agreed to.

The question was then taken upon the motion of Mr. BRIGHT; and upon a division there were—ayes 111, noes 37.

So the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, Mr. MILLIKEN in the chair.

MISSION OF SAINT JAMES, WASHINGTON TERRITORY.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now report the bill pending when the committee rose on Friday last, being the bill (H. R. No. 820) for the relief of the mission of Saint James, in Washington Territory, reported, with amendments, from the Committee on Private Land Claims.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas Congress, in the act entitled "An act to establish the territorial government of Oregon," passed on the 14th of August, 1848, provided "that the title to the land, not exceeding six hundred and forty acres, now occupied as missionary stations among the Indian tribes in said Territory, together with the improvements thereon, be confirmed and established in the several religious societies to which said missionary societies respectively belong," and by the act entitled "An act to establish the territorial government of Washington," passed on the 2d of March, 1853, provided "that the title to the land, not exceeding six hundred and forty acres, now occupied as missionary stations among the Indian tribes in said Territory, or that may have been so occupied as missionary stations prior to the passage of the act establishing the territorial government of Oregon, together with the improvements thereon, be, and is hereby, confirmed and established to the several religious societies to which said missionary societies respectively belong;"

And whereas the honorable Secretary of the Interior, by his official and final decision, under date of January 29, 1872, after taking cognizance of the testimony and law in the case, acknowledges that a Catholic mission, called the mission of Saint James, existed at Vancouver, Territory of Washington, on the 14th of August, 1848, within the meaning and provision of the aforesaid acts, and that the said mission is entitled to whatever quantity of land these acts are intended to grant;

And whereas the intention of the aforesaid acts is to grant to each missionary station among the Indian tribes in Oregon and Washington Territories on the 14th of August, 1848, and 2d of March, 1853, respectively, the quantity of six hundred and forty acres of the public lands of the United States, where this quantity can be found in compact form, so as to include the mission improvements, or so much of said land as can be found, not to exceed six hundred and forty acres;

And whereas by order of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, dated September 29, 1859, a survey of said claim was made, and a plat thereof, dated December, 1861, approved by the surveyor-general of Washington Territory, was forwarded, and is now on file in the General Land Office of the Department of the Interior, such survey placing the mission improvements as near the center of the claim as possible, and interfering with no prior legal rights: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it is hereby made the duty of the Secretary of the Interior, within two months after the passage of this act, to cause a patent to be issued for the claim of the Saint James mission of Washington Territory, in accordance with the aforesaid plat of survey, dated in December, 1861.

The amendments were to strike out the third paragraph of the preamble, and to add to the bill the following:

Provided, That nothing in this act shall operate in any way to affect, impair, or defeat any adverse claim to the land described in said patent, or to any part thereof; And provided further, That the United States shall have the right to remove therefrom any property, buildings, or fixtures it may have thereon.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House, all debate upon this bill has been limited to fifteen minutes.

Mr. JACOBS. As this bill appertains to Washington Territory, I would like to be heard for a short time in answer to some arguments made by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] when this bill was last under consideration in Committee of the Whole. I stated on Friday last that this bill covered a portion of a very important military reservation upon the Pacific coast, the most important military reservation north of San Francisco. It was intimated by the gentleman from Missouri, if not expressly stated by him, that this military reservation had been vacated. I send to the Clerk's desk a letter from the Secretary of War and ask the Clerk to read the portions I have marked.

Mr. BUCKNER. The gentleman is mistaken in saying that I said this reservation had been vacated. What I said was that the rights of the United States could not prevail against the claims of this mission.

Mr. JACOBS. I ask the Clerk to read the paper I have sent to his desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., January 17, 1877.

SIR: In reply to your letter of the 15th instant, in regard to the Fort Vancouver military reservation, in Washington Territory, and the Saint James Catholic mission claim, I have the honor to inform you that the reservation is still occupied as a military station, and is at present the regimental headquarters of the Twenty-first Infantry, and companies D, E, H, and I of said regiment are stationed there.

The reservation was intended for six companies, and embraces six hundred and forty acres, fronting twelve hundred yards on the Columbia River, and extending back about a mile and a half. It is regarded as one of the most important military posts on the Pacific coast, and was valued by the late General Canby at not less than $1,000,000.

* * * * * * *

I inclose copy of the opinion of Assistant Attorney-General W. H. Smith, dated January 29, 1872, on the claim to certain lands in Washington Territory by the Roman Catholic mission of Saint James, copy of the letter of the Attorney-General approving said opinion, and copy of the letter of the Secretary of the Interior to the Commissioner of the General Land Office directing him to carry into effect the views set forth in the opinion.

The possessory rights of the Hudson Bay Company covered all the land at Fort Vancouver and vicinity claimed by the mission, and hence the Saint James mission could not have any title to the land even if it were an existing mission under the act of 14th August, 1848, as the possessory rights were secured by treaty, and only waived in the case of the United States military reservation.

Lord Lyons (in his letter, inclosed in letter of the Secretary of State to the Secretary of War, dated May 19, 1859) says: "The unfounded character of this claim appears from documents of which copies have been laid before Her Majesty's government. * * * Her Majesty's government are confident that the Government of the United States will give no countenance to this unreasonable pretension on the part of the Roman Catholic mission."

On the 23d of May, 1853, Peter Skeen Ogden, on the part of the Hudson Bay Company, notified the surveyor-general of Oregon that no such mission (as the Saint James mission) ever existed at Fort Vancouver; that the Catholic church there was sustained in part by the Hudson Bay Company for their servants. "Its clergy have resided here at the sufferance only and by the permission of the company; have always been paid by the company £50 per annum."

The Hudson Bay Company's title and possessory rights were adjudicated by the British and American joint commission under the treaty of July 1, 1864.

Under section 7 of the act of September 27, 1850, no claim could attach to land selected for a military post, or within one mile thereof.

Your attention is invited to the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Lounsdale et al. vs. Parrish, (21 Howard, 290:) "Congress passed no law in any wise affecting the title to land in Oregon till September 27, 1850."

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. D. CAMERON,
Secretary of War.

Hon. O. JACOBS,
House of Representatives.

Mr. JACOBS. I stated on Friday last that the construction uniformly given to the proviso in the organic act of Oregon and Washington Territory by the courts of Oregon and of Washington Territory was that these mission claims, of which many existed, were entitled——

Mr. BUCKNER. I desire to claim the floor. I yielded to the gentleman only for the purpose of having a paper read, and I object to his occupying all the time allowed for debate.

Mr. JACOBS. I will merely make a statement, and then I will send to the Clerk's desk another paper to be read.

Mr. FORT. I fear the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] has made too short a limit of time. I am surprised that he should have proposed, on his own motion, to limit debate and then refuse to allow any other gentleman to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. That cannot be helped in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. FORT. When the proper time comes I will move that the committee rise in order to extend the time for debate.

Mr. JACOBS. I would like to conclude my statement, which is that the uniform decisions of the courts of Oregon and Washington Territory, and of the Department in Washington, are to the effect that these missions are entitled to no more land than they actually need for mission purposes. I send to the Clerk's desk, and ask him to read, an opinion of the Attorney-General of the United States, given at the time, and also a paper in connection with it showing the decision of the Department, which opinion and decision are in harmony with the statement which I made on Friday last.

Mr. BUCKNER. If there is any time left I desire to send to the Clerk's desk to be read the report of the Commissioner of the Land Office in 1859, as to the rights of these missions.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would ask the gentleman upon what terms he yielded to the gentleman from Washington Territory?

Mr. BUCKNER. I yielded to him to have a document read.

The CHAIRMAN. All that he desires to be read has not yet been read. The Clerk will now read the remaining paper sent up by the gentleman from Washington Territory.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, D. C., January 29, 1872.

SIR: I have carefully considered the case presented by the claim of the Roman Catholic mission of Saint James at Vancouver, Washington Territory, for six hundred and forty acres of land, coming up to your office upon appeal from a decision of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, of November 10, 1862, adverse to the said mission, and referred to me by you for my advice. I herewith submit my views upon the several questions of law and facts involved.

* * * * * * *

From the facts stated substantially above the mission station at Vancouver now claim under the proviso quoted six hundred and forty acres of land, including improvements thereon. The claim of the mission is opposed by three different interests, as follows:

First. The military authorities, in charge of the United States military reserve at Vancouver, a portion of which is covered by the claim of the mission.

The record shows that in 1849 the military authorities, then in Oregon, with the consent and at the request of the Hudson Bay Company established a reserve at Vancouver.

For this purpose a written agreement was entered into between Peter Skeen Ogden, on the part of the company, and Rufus Ingalls, on the part of the United States, by which the company agreed to allow the United States to take post there and put up such buildings and occupy such vacant lands as might be necessary.

In consequence of this agreement troops were stationed at this point. In May, 1850, by order of General P. F. Smith, under directions from the War Department, Colonel W. W. Loring, United States Army, declared a reserve of four miles square.

On the 20th of October, 1853, in consequence of the passage of the act of February 14th of that year, the reserve was reduced by order of the War Department to six hundred and forty acres.

On this reserve the Government erected very valuable improvements, estimated at from $200,000 to $1,000,000.

Second. The widow and heirs-at-law of Amos M. Short, who claims under the act of September 27, 1850, (9 stat., 498, sec. 4,) six hundred and forty acres of land, partly covered by the claim of the mission.

It is shown that as early as 1844 or 1845 Short made repeated efforts to obtain a permanent settlement on the land now claimed by his widow and heirs; that he was twice driven off by the agents of the Hudson Bay Company, and was once ejected, under legal process, by one Ettinger; that he finally obtained a settlement which he maintained until his death in 1853; and that his family have, since his death, continuously resided on the tract.

Third. The citizens of the town of Vancouver, who claim under the town site act of 1844 (5 stat., 657) the right to enter a certain tract of land situated between the claim of Short on the west and the military reservation on the east, and included within the claim of the mission.

It is shown that at an early day this tract, having been excluded by the order of the War Department referred to from the reserve, and being to the east of the Short claim, was settled upon and occupied by a number of persons, who commenced to build a town, and that there were, in 1862, some three hundred persons on the tract, which, at that time, had been surveyed into blocks and lots.

* * * * * * *

Proceeding now to the case under consideration, I am of opinion that the proviso in the first section of the act of 1848 conferred an immediate vested right upon all societies then within its provisions; "That the title to the land * * * be confirmed and established" is the language. Here is a confirmation of title, immediately, operating proprio vigore for the benefit of all who should at that date be within its provisions. This construction of the law is the one adopted by Attorney-General Bates in his opinion of May 27, 1864 by the Commissioner of the General Land Office in his instructions to the Surveyor General, by Secretary Harlan in his review of Attorney-General Bates's opinion; and, so far as I know, it has never been anywhere seriously questioned. The only real questions are, therefore, first, who are within its provisions and, second, what is confirmed?

First, occupancy as a missionary station among the Indians at the date of the passage of the act to the qualification prescribed.

Whenever it is found that any religious society had, at the date of the act, a missionary station among any of the Indian tribes in said Territory, such society has conclusively shown a vested right, as of that date, under the proviso. As to what constitutes a "missionary station" among the Indian tribes, I shall say more in another place.

Second. What is confirmed to a religious society, shown to be within the limits of the proviso? In my opinion, only the land actually occupied as a mission, and which was with reasonable clearness set forth by specific boundaries, together with all improvements thereon, the amount in no case to exceed six hundred and forty acres. This is contrary to the view heretofore entertained by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, who in his instructions to the surveyor-general of Oregon of August 18, 1853, said, "Such provision (referring to the proviso) is understood to grant six hundred and forty acres to each separate and distinct missionary station referred to."

The words of the proviso are, "now occupied as missionary stations." As nothing appears to show that the word "occupied" is here used in any other than its generally received and popular signification, which is that of possession, this meaning should be given it. This possession, like any possession, must be demonstrated in some way by recognized boundaries. I would not be understood to say that in every case where land is claimed under this proviso the claimants should be obliged to show an actual corporeal possession of all the land claimed by such evidence as having it inclosed, cultivating it, building upon it, or the like; but in my opinion there must be something to show, with reasonable certainty, the amount really claimed at the date of the act.

There must be such an assertion of the claim as would be notice to any other person attempting to gain possession. An inclosure would of course be the best evidence; but I think such inferior evidence as the marking out of this claim by stakes, or blazed trees, or the common reputation among the settlers and Indians, as to its bounds would be sufficient.

For the charitable purpose of the proviso, I would give the language a most liberal construction; but I know of no rule so liberal as to hold land "occupied" which has never been included in any inclosure nor in any asserted claim, and upon which no improvements have ever been made. I am unable to see how Commissioner Wilson reached the conclusion contained in his instructions to the surveyor-general. It is, in my opinion, an erroneous construction of the proviso; and as the question is now for the first time presented to the Department as an independent proposition, and as the claim under consideration is the first of these mission claims to be finally determined, so far as departmental action is concerned, I recommend that you give the proviso the construction I have laid down. Now to apply this construction of the law to the case under consideration.

On the 14th day of August, 1848, the date of the passage of the act, the mission of Saint James was in actual possession of a small piece of land, upon which had been erected a church in which the priests there stationed held religious worship. The mission at that day had never asserted any claim whatever, had no inclosure, and was therefore only in the occupancy of the land covered by the church edifice and such land as was appendant to it. This it occupied, in my opinion, as a missionary station among the Indians.

The society to which said mission belongs has, therefore, a vested title, under the act of 1848, to the land upon which the church edifice stands and as much appurtenant thereto as at the date of the passage of the act was within the inclosure, or used for church purposes.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, March 2, 1872.

SIR: I herewith return the opinion of Assistant Attorney General Smith upon the claim of the Roman Catholic mission of Saint James for six hundred and forty acres of land at Vancouver, in Washington Territory.

I have not examined the questions of fact discussed and decided by him, and upon them therefore express no opinion. But I have examined and approve his views to the effect that the Land Department of the Government has jurisdiction to determine whether or not the said Catholic mission has acquired title to six hundred and forty acres or any other quantity of land at Vancouver, in Washington Territory, under and by virtue of section 1, of the act of August 14, 1868, entitled "An act to establish the territorial government of Oregon."

What effect the decision is to have if judicially questioned, the courts will decide for themselves.

Very respectfully,

GEO. H. WILLIAMS,
Attorney-General.

Hon. COLUMBUS DELANO,
Secretary of the Interior.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, D. C., March 11, 1872.

SIR: I transmit herewith a copy of the opinion of Hon. Walter H. Smith, Assistant Attorney-General, of 29th January last, on the claim of the Roman Catholic mission of Saint James to certain lands in the Vancouver district, Washington Territory, under the act of 14th August, 1848. (9 Statutes, 323.)

I also transmit a copy of a letter on the subject, addressed to the Department on the 2d instant, by Hon. G. H. Williams, Attorney-General, to whom the opinion of the Assistant Attorney-General was submitted. I fully concur in the views set forth in the opinion, and you will give the necessary orders to carry them into effect.

The papers accompanying your letter of 18th April last are herewith returned.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

B. R. COWEN,
Acting Secretary.

Hon. WILLIS DRUMMOND,
Commissioner General Land Office.

Before the reading of the foregoing was concluded,

Mr. BRIGHT. I rise to a point of order. The House limited debate on this question to fifteen minutes, and that time, I understand, has expired. I understand from several gentlemen that they desire further discussion of the subject; and therefore, if it be agreeable, I will move that the committee rise with the view of extending the time for debate one-half hour, fifteen minutes on each side.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I think it very doubtful whether half an hour is sufficient. I understand that this bill involves property in which the United States has a large interest, property worth perhaps a million of dollars, and which will probably be taken away by this bill.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I rise to a point of order. I submit that the Committee of the Whole has not the power to extend the time for debate.

Mr. BRIGHT. There is no proposition that the committee shall make such an extension. I move that the committee rise in order that the House may extend the time.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. MILLIKEN reported that the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 820) for the relief of the mission of Saint James, in Washington Territory, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. BRIGHT. I move that when the House shall again resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar debate on the pending bill (H. R. No. 820) be limited to one-half hour, fifteen minutes on each side.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ELKINS. I move that all debate in Committee of the Whole on the bill (H. R. No. 344) to confirm certain private land claims in the Territory of New Mexico be limited to one hour and a half.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BRIGHT. I move that the House again resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, (Mr. MILLIKEN in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 820) for the relief of the mission of Saint James, in Washington Territory.

Mr. JACOBS. I ask the Clerk to continue the reading, in which he was interrupted by the rising of the Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the document as already given.

Mr. JACOBS. In addition to what appears by the papers which have been read, I simply wish to state a few facts that ought to be taken into consideration in passing on this question. In the first place a portion of this land to the extent of one hundred and sixty acres has already been patented to the city of Vancouver. Another tract of one hundred and sixty acres is claimed by some heirs under the donation law for Oregon and Washington Territory. The city of Vancouver, containing from fifteen hundred to eighteen hundred inhabitants, is upon this land. Now, if I understand the gentleman from Missouri correctly, he says that the only object of this bill is to obtain a trial of the title to this land. But what will be the effect of the bill? Immediately upon its passage, these citizens of Vancouver who have purchased this land from the city or from the Short heirs will have to pay rent to this mission. Notwithstanding the fact that after a long, tedious, and exhaustive litigation, continued for years in the Land Department of the Government, the decisions have all been against this mission, it is now proposed that the Congress of the United States shall turn round and give to this defeated party a patent to the property. What would this mission have thought if they had been the successful party and the Congress of the United States had undertaken after all the litigation to give the patent to the opposite party?

Mr. BUCKNER. Will the gentleman allow me just one question?

Mr. JACOBS. No, sir; not if it is to be taken out of my time.

Furthermore, as I have before stated, the Government of the United States has established upon this land a military reservation which the Secretary of War says is worth $1,000,000. It is proposed now to give to this mission the title to this military reservation. The whole property proposed to be given to the mission under this patent is worth at least $2,000,000. In view of these facts I ask whether the Congress of the United States is prepared to pass this bill, especially when the decisions of the Land Department, as I have already remarked, have been uniformly in opposition to the claim of the mission?

I maintain that there is no necessity for the passage of the bill in order that the mission may test the title to the property. A patent for one hundred and sixty acres of this land has already been issued by the Government; and if the only object is to test the validity of the title, the mission can commence suit in the courts of the Territory and have that question passed upon.

Furthermore, this was a legislative grant; and it is not necessary that a patent should issue from the Government. Such has been the opinion of the Attorneys-General of the United States, and also, I believe, the construction of the courts. All that it was necessary for the mission to do, if their construction of the law be correct, was to furnish their proof in the local land office. The act of 1848, under which they claim, gives them a legislative title; and all that was necessary was for them to furnish their proof, and afterward they could institute a suit in the courts to test the validity of their title. Now, this is about all I desire to say on the matter.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] intimated, in the remarks which he made last Friday, that possibly I was connected with some of these parties as their attorney. I have never had anything to do with this case as attorney, neither with the Short heirs nor the city of Vancouver.

Mr. BUCKNER. Mr. Chairman, in the first place I want to say that the gentleman from Washington Territory is incorrect when he supposes I meant to insinuate he was acting as the agent of anybody or any party. I presumed he was doing what he supposed was his duty in reference to the interest of the country, as well as in reference to his constituents.

This bill has been twice reported upon favorably by two committees of this House, one in the Forty-third Congress and one in this Congress. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PRATT] in the last Congress reported from the Committee on Private Land Claims, with the unanimous recommendation of the members of that committee, a bill in favor of the rights of this mission to this six hundred and forty acres of land, and that too after one of the most exhaustive and learned arguments by the attorneys of the parties representing the various interests involved. The Committee on Private Land Claims at this session made a similar report after the matter was thoroughly investigated. They reported this bill so as to present all these questions to Congress as to the right to this land.

It is said there is a large amount of land, two or three million dollars' worth of land, involved. Grant that to be true, and I know not whether it is true or false, but this bill proposes to take the land from no human being unless the courts so decide. This bill does not provide that any right shall be affected except the mere transfer of the right of the United States. In other words, it is equivalent merely to a quitclaim deed from the United States, and nothing more.

The gentleman says that a patent has been issued by the Land Office during the last few years to the town of Vancouver. That patent expressly recognizes the right of the Saint James mission, and I undertake to say there has been no decision on this question, except that opinion of Mr. Smith, and in reference to that opinion every member of the Committee on Private Land Claims held that it was not only not law, but the object was to prevent these parties getting their rights.

Now, in every other case, certainly in the case of the mission at the Dalles in Oregon, certainly in one or two other cases of Lutheran and Presbyterian missions, the Government of the United States has given to these missions their lands.

Mr. LUTTRELL. In every one of them.

Mr. BUCKNER. But the Catholic mission is located here, and the real question at the bottom of all this is whether you are going to make a discrimination against the Catholic Church. If they have no right, all that is asked is let them go into the courts and the courts, I presume, will decide correctly.

The gentleman talks of the rights of the United States. No one pretends the Government of the United States has any rights in the matter if the mission is entitled to the land. That is a question which it is proposed to have settled in the courts. No member of the committee supposed, no one pretended to set up any right on the part of the Government of the United States, because the reservation was made subject to the rights of these parties.

I send to the Clerk's desk to be read, Mr. Chairman, an extract from the report of Commissioner Wilson on this very question—a gentleman not only a most faithful officer of the Government, but who is regarded as a fine lawyer—when he settled the question as to the rights of these missions.

The Clerk read as follows:

> The rights of the United States fully ceased and determined on the 14th August, 1848. The tract was subject then to the possessory rights of the Hudson Bay Company, for the treaty said those rights should be respected. Those rights continued by their license until May, 1859, and when that incubus was removed, by the extinction of those rights, it left the grant to the mission of Saint James full, ample, and complete, now entitled to enjoy the same in all its parts, with the right to ask for and receive from the United States a deed of confirmation or patent so soon as the lands could be surveyed.
> The papers on file show that the mission notification was on file before any claims were asserted to contiguous lands. It is the oldest claim. Its recognition is coeval with the organization of Oregon, and was a positive grant more than two years before any American settler could acquire an interest in or title to unoccupied public lands. The mission had been used since the winter of 1838. It is not my province to comment upon the wisdom or policy of such a law, and it is a matter of regret that private interests may by such decision apparently suffer; but the law making grants to missions is so clear and positive, the evidence so direct and long continuing, bringing this station or mission within the purview of the law, that there is but one duty to perform: confirm to the mission six hundred and forty acres of land, in accordance with said grant, and as shown by the accompanying plat and field-notes of the official survey.

Mr. BUCKNER. Mr. Chairman, I said on last Friday that the Government of the United States had recognized the rights of every other mission in this Territory except this, and this only partially. The Government so far recognized the right of the mission at Dalles that when there was a United States reservation placed upon that land the Government paid $23,000 to the mission as payment for the land taken up for that reservation, the Government thereby recognizing the right of the mission to that property. Nor do the papers which the gentleman read here from Mr. Smith, and the late Commissioner of the General Land Office, affect the right to some of the property at this mission. They have issued patents, in point of fact, to a quarter of an acre, or one acre, merely covering the ground upon which the mission buildings are located, thereby recognizing the existence of the mission; and the question to be determined was whether the mission extended beyond the mere personal, actual occupancy of ground for buildings, or whether it included six hundred and forty acres, the same granted to every other mission, and which Mr. Wilson, the Commissioner of the General Land Office, decided that this mission was entitled to.

This bill cannot affect the rights of anybody save the rights of the United States; and nobody has ever pretended that the United States ever have put up any claim there. And there is no pretense but the United States did either grant the property to these citizens who are now claiming and are represented by my friend from Washington Territory [Mr. JACOBS] or to the Saint James mission; and this bill is for the purpose of letting these parties assert their rights to this land in the courts of the country. Here the patent is authorized to be issued. The effect of that patent is merely to grant a quit-claim deed on the part of the Government, and leave for the decision of the courts the question as to whether they or Vancouver or Short's heirs are entitled to this land.

But the gentleman from Washington Territory says that there is no necessity for any action of the Government in order to give these parties a right in court. I say that, so far as concerns the land that has been severed from the public domain and surveyed under the decision of the late Commissioner, that is enough; but that only gives them a half acre of ground—the ground covered by their church and school-building—cutting off the orchard and much of the land proved to have been occupied for the last twenty-five or thirty years by this mission.

I understood the gentleman from Washington Territory to say that until the land is severed from the public domain by a survey no man can go into court and have any status there; that in order to this the Government must sever private land from the public domain. But while this may be the case under a legislative grant, the question is whether that grant contained six hundred and forty acres, or half an acre, or a quarter of an acre; and the object of the bill is to enable the courts to decide that, and nothing more. That I undertake to say, and the gentleman does not deny it. But I intended to ask him the question whether the Vancouver patent did not save the rights of the Saint James mission? Will the gentleman answer?

Mr. JACOBS. I am not able to say.

Mr. BUCKNER. I know it as a fact that when the patents were issued to the inhabitants of Vancouver those patents expressly, in so many words, preserved the right of this mission, and they get nothing as against it. But how are they in a condition to sue, provided they are entitled, as I believe and as the committee of both Houses unanimously believe, provided they are entitled to an amount of land not exceeding six hundred and forty acres, to be laid off as Mr. Wilson instructed the surveyor-general? How can they assert anything beyond the half acre given by this patent? It is utterly impossible. And yet when they assert this claim, they have no rights against anybody having a better title. If these Vancouver parties have a right to this one million or two millions of dollars' worth of property, let them have it, but let them have it by a judgment of the court. And this bill enables them to have it decided by a court; and so it is with the Short heirs.

There is another claim, what is called the donation claim, in which the Short heirs have a right. If they are entitled to it as against this mission, by the judgment of the courts this bill enables this question to come before them and to be decided.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. BUCKNER. Yes, sir.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Have they not proposed to cut off even the cemetery from this mission?

Mr. BUCKNER. Certainly. The patent given to the mission, and which was a recognition of the existence of that mission as far back as 1838, actually cuts off everything except the buildings—the church and school-house; it cuts off their orchard, their burial ground, and all their farm which they had been occupying almost from 1838 to the present time. That is the effect of it.

Now we do not say that there shall be an absolute patent. We do not pretend to settle the question who is entitled to this land. But we do say the only way by which this question can be settled is to put it in the courts. The gentleman from Washington Territory says it may be settled otherwise. There is no doubt it may be settled in this way. I do not know, I have never heard, and I do not believe now that there is any way by which the right of the Saint James mission can ever be settled by any adjudication of a court until this land is severed and a quit-claim given by the Government to these parties. And the effect of not passing this bill is absolutely to deny their right to go into court and have the question passed upon whether they are entitled to six hundred and forty acres or only half an acre. That will be the effect of your action on this bill.

I hope there will be no dispute about this. I will read the provision of the bill by which, as I say, this is nothing in the world but a quit-claim deed on the part of the General Government. If the Government has any claim that is valuable they will, as in the case of the Dalles mission, pay us the value. But the land was patented prior to the military reservation being established. Now, this bill does not deal in any doubtful words. Its language says that these parties represented here are willing that this question shall be presented to the courts. This is the language of the proviso:

Provided, That nothing in this act shall operate in any way to affect, impair, or defeat any adverse claim to the land described in said patent or to any part thereof: And provided further, That the United States shall have the right to remove therefrom any property, buildings, or fixtures it may have thereon.

Now, I say that there is certainly some respect due to two committees of this House, composed of twenty-two men, all of them lawyers, I believe, who have investigated this subject. It was investigated during the last Congress; and after a very exhaustive argument some gentlemen, who had taken up the opinion that this mission was entitled to only a quarter of an acre of land, or just enough to hold their buildings, came to the conclusion that they were entitled to six hundred and forty acres. That is my deliberate judgment. I have no more doubt, as a question of law, about the right of this Saint James mission to six hundred and forty acres of land than I have that I am standing here. But in order to obviate the objection made to our deciding this question by this bill, it is in point of fact remitted to the courts, and it is left to them to determine whether Fort Vancouver reservation is entitled to six hundred and forty acres of land, or whether the Short heirs are entitled to six hundred and forty acres, or whether this mission of Saint James is entitled to that amount of land.

Mr. MAGOON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BUCKNER. Certainly.

Mr. MAGOON. From what committee was this bill reported?

Mr. BUCKNER. From the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. MAGOON. Is there any minority report?

Mr. BUCKNER. No, and there was none in the last Congress when a bill was reported much stronger than this, because it gave to the mission the absolute right to six hundred and forty acres of land.

Mr. MAGOON. Is this a unanimous report of the committee?

Mr. BUCKNER. It is. It is not only reported unanimously now, but it was unanimously reported by the committee of the last Congress.

Mr. CONGER. What was the date of the law giving to missions generally six hundred and forty acres each?

Mr. BUCKNER. It was the law of 1848 establishing the Territory of Oregon. I will read the provision under which these missions were allowed six hundred and forty acres each:

That the title to the land, not exceeding six hundred and forty acres, now occupied as missionary stations among the Indian tribes in said Territory, together with the improvements thereon, be confirmed and established in the several religious societies to which said missionary stations respectively belong.

The committee have construed the term "improvements" as intended to locate the mission, and not to affect the quantity of land given to each mission. That has been the uniform construction of all acts of Congress on that subject. When, for instance, the law gives to settlers one hundred and sixty acres of land, in such a law the term "improvements" is commonly used. Now to the mind of every gentleman at all acquainted with the laws of Congress on that subject and the history of the action of the Department under those laws, the word "improvements" is understood to designate the locum quo of the land given. In this case the land is not to exceed six hundred and forty acres, but you cannot confine it to the actual amount which you may happen to have possessio pedis, or under foot, that you have your foot upon.

This matter was fully investigated under the instructions of the commission of the land office in 1860, under the direction of Commissioner Wilson, to ascertain whether this mission had a station, when the station began, to what extent the mission occupied it, and what was the character of the improvements upon it. All these matters were investigated when a land office was first opened in the Territory of Washington. The decision which I have had read by the Clerk was the result of the action of the commission of the land office on the report which was then made to it. Until the Land Office here took a different view within the last two or three years, there never was any doubt upon the subject; it was held that this mission was entitled to six hundred and forty acres. It is admitted by the opponents of this bill that there was a mission at this place, and they proposed to give the mission one-half of one-quarter of an acre, just enough to contain their church and building. Now I say to this Committee of the Whole, and I am sure that every lawyer who has examined the subject will say the same thing, that this mission is entitled to every part of the six hundred and forty acres, provided their possessions extend to that much, and it has been shown that they have occupied far more than that amount.

Mr. FORT. How did it come that Attorney-General Bates was called upon to make a decision upon this subject?

Mr. BUCKNER. Attorney-General Bates decided that this was a legislative grant, and there is no doubt about that. The difficulty is that you have not severed the land, and hence the Government has to act by its surveyor in order to designate how much land there is. I have no doubt that this is a legislative grant by the Government of the United States. That, however, is not the question. The question is how much land did the Government give? And this bill provides that that question shall be settled by the courts.

Mr. LUTTRELL. And the only point at issue is whether the courts shall settle the amount?

Mr. BUCKNER. That is the only question this bill undertakes to settle; we leave it to the courts. I see my friend from Iowa here, Judge PRATT. In the last Congress he reported to the House a bill which gave absolutely the six hundred and forty acres, according to the construction of Commissioner Wilson.

The CHAIRMAN. The time allotted by the order of the House for debate upon this bill has expired.

Mr. BUCKNER. I ask, then, that the committee now proceed to vote.

Mr. JACOBS. I move to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

The question was taken upon the motion to strike out the enacting clause; and upon a division there were—ayes 27, noes 62.

Mr. JACOBS. No quorum has voted, and I ask that tellers be appointed.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. BUCKNER and Mr. TOWNSEND of New York were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 51, noes 87.

No further count being called for, the motion to strike out the enacting clause was not agreed to.

The amendments reported by the committee were read, as follows:

Strike from the preamble the following:

Whereas the intention of the aforesaid acts is to grant to each missionary station among the Indian tribes in Oregon and Washington Territories on the 14th of August, 1848, and 3d of March, 1853, respectively, the quantity of six hundred and forty acres of the public lands of the United States, where this quantity can be found in compact form, so as to include the mission improvements, or so much of said land as can be found, not to exceed six hundred and forty acres; and.

Add to the bill the following:

Provided, That nothing in this act shall operate in any way to affect, impair, or defeat any adverse claim to the land described in said patent, or to any part thereof: And provided further, That the United States shall have the right to remove therefrom any property, buildings, or fixtures it may have thereon.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend by adding to the bill the following, to come before the proviso just read.

Or for such part of said land as the Secretary of the Interior may find that said society is entitled to upon a review of all the facts which have been or shall be submitted to him in connection with the said grant.

I ask that the bill be read with the amendment, so as to show its connection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That it is hereby made the duty of the Secretary of the Interior, within two months after the passage of this act, to cause a patent to be issued for the claim of the Saint James mission of Washington Territory, in accordance with the aforesaid plat of survey, dated in December, 1861; or for such part of said land as the Secretary of the Interior may find that said society is entitled to upon a review of all the facts which have been or shall be submitted to him in connection with the said grant.

Mr. BUCKNER. That will defeat the whole object of the bill; it brings up again the very difficulty we want to cure.

Mr. HOLMAN. It provides for a proper tribunal to decide the case; that is all.

Mr. BRIGHT. I call for the regular order. Debate is exhausted.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the amendments of the committee be read.

The bill, as proposed to be amended, was again read.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I think there is some mistake. What has just been read, as I understand, is the substitute reported by the committee. The only amendment pending is that of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.]

The CHAIRMAN. The amendments just read are those reported by the committee.

Mr. O'BRIEN. But they are in the nature of an original bill, and require no vote of the Committee of the Whole.

The CHAIRMAN. Whether reported as a substitute or as separate amendments, they have to be voted on.

Mr. HOLMAN. I submit as a question of order, that the substitute being before the committee for amendment, the amendment I have submitted is to be voted on in the first instance and then the question will be whether the substitute (amended or not amended, as the case may be) shall be adopted.

I desire to add to the amendment I have already submitted the following words:

Or the society may institute a suit in the United States district court for the district of Washington against the United States and all other parties concerned, to determine its interest and right in the said land.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. HOLMAN, as modified, there were—ayes 10, noes 47.

Mr. HOLMAN. No quorum has voted; but I will waive that point if it be understood that a vote may be had on my amendment in the House.

Mr. O'BRIEN. There is no objection to that.

Mr. BUCKNER. I have no objection to the bill being reported with that understanding.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] is not agreed to.

The question being taken on the amendments reported as a substitute by the Committee on Public Lands, they were agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. Of course it is understood that when the bill as amended by the committee has been reported to the House, my amendment shall be submitted to a vote.

Mr. BUCKNER. I have no objection to that. I move that the committee rise and report the bill as amended to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. MILLIKEN reported that the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 820) for the relief of the mission of Saint James, in Washington Territory, had directed him to report the same with certain amendments, and with a recommendation that it be passed as amended.

CONTINGENT FUND OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. FOSTER submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 4370) making appropriations to supply certain deficiencies in the contingent fund of the House of Representatives, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 11, and agree to the same;

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 12, and agree to the same;

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 7, and agree to the same, amended as follows:

Strike out all of said amendment after the word "of," in line 3, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "$1,200 per annum, $1,861.17."

And the Senate agree to the same.

CHARLES FOSTER,
WILLIAM S. HOLMAN,
J. H. BLOUNT,
Managers on the part of the House.
WILLIAM WINDOM,
W. B. ALLISON,
R. E. WITHERS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The report was adopted.

Mr. FOSTER moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MISSION OF SAINT JAMES, WASHINGTON TERRITORY.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, in the chair.) The question now recurs on the bill (H. R. No. 820) for the relief of the mission of Saint James, Washington Territory, reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. BUCKNER. I demand the previous question.

Mr. HOLMAN. It was the understanding, when the committee rose and consent was given to report this bill to the House with the recommendation that it do pass, that I should have an opportunity to present my amendment. I did not insist on my objection that no quorum had voted, on the understanding that I should have an opportunity to have a vote on my amendment in the House.

Mr. BUCKNER. I do not object to that, as that was the understanding, but after the gentleman submits his amendment I demand the previous question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask to make a change in my amendment.

Mr. BUCKNER. The understanding was that the gentleman should present his amendment as it was offered in the committee, and not another amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I merely desire to perfect my amendment, and I hope the gentleman will abide by the understanding of the House.

Mr. BUCKNER. I am willing to abide by the understanding of the House, and I ask that the gentleman's amendment be read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the gentleman from Missouri will allow me to perfect the phraseology of my amendment. I wish to add to the amendment as it was offered in the committee these words:

Or the said society may institute a suit in the district court of the United States for the Territory of Washington against the United States and all other persons concerned, to determine its rights in said land; and jurisdiction is conferred upon said court for the full determination thereof.

Mr. BUCKNER. I do not see the propriety of any such amendment. The object is evidently to defeat the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to that amendment?

Mr. BUCKNER. I do not object to allowing the gentleman to change the phraseology of his amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now ask the Clerk to read the whole amendment as it now stands before the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Or for such part of said land as the Secretary of the Interior may find that said society is entitled to upon a review of all the facts which have been or shall be submitted to him in connection with the said grant; or the said society may institute a suit in the district court of the United States for the Territory of Washington against the United States and all other persons concerned, to determine its rights in said land; and jurisdiction is conferred on said court for a full determination thereof.

Mr. WHITE. That is entirely satisfactory.

Mr. BUCKNER. The object is to defeat the bill, and I hope it will be voted down.

Mr. JACOBS. There is no objection to that amendment.

Mr. BUCKNER. I insist on the demand for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 48, noes 67.

Mr. SAVAGE demanded the yeas and nays.

The House divided; and there were ayes 18; not a sufficient number.

Mr. WHITE demanded tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the amendment was rejected.

The question next recurred on the substitute reported from the Committee of the Whole House.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 72, noes 39; no quorum voting.

The Speaker pro tempore appointed Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. BUCKNER as tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 124, noes 17.

So the substitute was adopted.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. HOLMAN demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 129, nays 65, not voting 95; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ainsworth, Ashe, Atkins, John H. Bagley jr., Bland, Blount, Boone, Bradford, Bright, John Young Brown, Buckner, Samuel D. Burchard, Burleigh, Cabell, John H. Caldwell, William P. Caldwell, Campbell, Candler, Cannon, Cate, Caulfield, John B. Clarke of Kentucky, John B. Clark, jr., of Missouri, Cochrane, Collins, Conger, Cook, Cowan, Davis, De Bolt, Dibrell, Douglas, Durham, Eden, Ellis, Felton, Finley, Forney, Fort, Franklin, Gause, Goode, Goodin, Gunter, Robert Hamilton, Hancock, Henry R. Herr Smith, Strait, Stowell, Thornburgh, Tufts, Waldron, Alexander S. Wallace, John W. Wallace, G. Wiley Wells, White, Andrew Williams, Charles G. Williams, William B. Williams, James Wilson, and Alan Wood, jr.—65.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Abbott, Adams, Anderson, Bagby, George A. Bagley, Ballou, Banks, Banning, Bass, Beebe, Blackburn, Bliss, Carr, Cason, Chapin, Chittenden, Cox, Crounse, Culberson, Darrall, Davy, Durand, Eames, Egbert, Faulkner, Field, Foster, Freeman, Fuller, Garfield, Gibson, Glover, Haralson, Hardenbergh, John T. Harris, Hathorn, Hays, Hereford, Hill, Hoar, Hooker, Hurd, Jenks, King, Lane, Lawrence, Lord, Lynch, Lynde, Maish, McDill, McFarland, McMahon, Meade, Metcalfe, Miller, Money, Morrison, Neal, Packer, Phelps, John F. Philips, William A. Phillips, Platt, Pratt, Purman, James B. Reilly, Miles Ross, Sobieski Ross, Rusk, Savage, Sayler, Seelye, Singleton, Stephens, Stevenson, Swann, Teese, Washington Townsend, Van Vorhes, Wait, Charles C. B. Walker, Walling, Ward, Warren, Wheeler, Whitehouse, Whiting, Wigginton, Willard, James Williams, Fernando Wood, Woodburn, Woodworth, and Young—95.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. BUCKNER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HOLMAN, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4472) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1878, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of Union, made a special order therein for Tuesday next after the morning hour, and from day to day thereafter until disposed of, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. KASSON. I reserve all points of order on the bill.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found duly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 231) for the relief of Robert Erwin; and

An act (H. R. No. 1850) granting a pension to Harvey B. Kilborn, private in Company C, Thirtieth Regiment Pennsylvania Militia.

PROVISIONAL GOVERNMENT OF THE DISTRICT.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House a message from the President of the United States.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

At the request of the Attorney-General, I have the honor to transmit herewith a report in answer to the resolutions of the House adopted on the 1st of August, 1876, relative to certain matters occurring in the administration of the provisional government of the District of Columbia, and chiefly affecting the commissioners and the late board of audit.

U. S. GRANT.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, January 19, 1877.

The message and accompanying papers were referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

ROCKLAND, MAINE.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, recommending that Rockland, Maine, be made a port of delivery, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. WILLIAMS, of Delaware, till Monday on account of important business;

To Mr. ODELL, till Wednesday next.

LEWIS PETOSKEY.

On motion of Mr. BRADLEY, by unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 920) to authorize Lewis Petoskey, of Michigan, to enter a certain tract of land which embraces his home and improvements was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

COUNT OF THE ELECTORAL VOTE.

Mr. A. S. WILLIAMS. I ask unanimous consent to present and have read a petition from the Detroit Board of Trade, touching the count of the electoral vote for President and Vice-President.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I object.

NATHANIEL S. CLARKE.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read and referred to the Committee of Accounts:

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House be, and he is hereby, directed to pay to Nathaniel S. Clarke, out of the contingent fund, $100 per month for services rendered by him as messenger to this House since the first Monday of December, 1876, and that he be paid at the same rate for such services as he may render in the same capacity during the residue of this session.

Mr. PAGE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. J. H. BAGLEY: The petition of Charles M. Thomas and others, of Kingston, New York, that pensioners be paid from the date of their discharge from the Army, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BLAIR: The petition of citizens of Cambridge City, Indiana, for a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. BURLEIGH: The petition of Samuel L. Paine, late a private in the Ninth Regiment Maine Infantry, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. COX: The petition of Jonas R. Levy, that the Secretary of State be directed to return to him the title deeds and other documents belonging to him and others he represents, turned over to the State Department by the Mexican commission, to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. CRAPO: The petition of Caroline S. Webster, widow of Colonel Fletcher Webster, for an increase of pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, the petition of S. W. Hall and others, of Marion, Massachusetts, for cheap telegraphy, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. CUTLER: The petition of citizens of Woodbridge, New Jersey, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of the Friends' Temperance Union of New York, signed by its officers, for the passage of the Senate bill providing for a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. FINLEY: The petition of citizens of Florida, for authority to construct a ship-canal at the head of Lake George, Florida, to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

By Mr. HUBBELL: The petition of Israel Frost and 40 other citizens of Oxford County, Michigan, for the enforcement of the provisions of the act of July 24, 1866, providing for the purchase of telegraph lines by the General Government, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. HUNTON: The petition of the heirs of Jacob Dehaven, to refund the money advanced by said Dehaven to carry on the Revolutionary War, to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

By Mr. KASSON: The petition of citizens of Iowa, for cheap telegraphy, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. LAPHAM: The petition of citizens of New York, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of citizens of New York, that pensioners be paid from the date of their discharge from the Army, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. LUTTRELL: The petition of P. O. Shattuck, and 50 others, of California, for cheap telegraphy, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. O'NEILL: Preamble and resolutions of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, recommending their Represenatives and instructing their Senators to adhere to the constitutional provisions in declaring who has been elected President and Vice-President of the United States, to the committee on counting the electoral vote.

By Mr. SHEAKLEY: The petition of citizens of Crawford County, Pennsylvania, for the removal of limitations in the pension laws, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia: The petition of John Bohn, for compensation for services rendered as a laborer on the public grounds, to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina: The petition of J. T. Sorrells, of Asheville, North Carolina, that he be paid $223.50 for property taken by the United States Army, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. WALLING: The petition of H. T. Gooley and 24 others, of New Holland, Ohio, for the enforcement of the act of July 24, 1866, relating to the purchase of telegraph lines by the General Government, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, January 20, 1877.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 15th instant, information relative to the use by the Government of any machine or machines for making bullets or molding shells, patented by W. H. Ward; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

CREDENTIALS.

Mr. MORTON presented the credentials of William Pitt Kellogg, elected by the Legislature of the State of Louisiana a Senator from that State for the term beginning March 4, 1877; which were read and ordered to be filed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SARGENT. I present the petition of Elizabeth Schenck, Mrs. C. C. Calhoun, and others—94 men and 108 women—being 202 citizens of the State of California, praying for a sixteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibiting the several States from disfranchising United States citizens on account of sex.

It is imperatively necessary in a republic that every adult person of sound mind and innocent before the law should have the right to express opinions upon public affairs. The State is entitled to the benefit of such counsel; the individual has a natural right to give it and needs it for personal protection. Such opinion can only be effectively expressed through the ballot. To deny the ballot to one-half of the people of the United States, who are recognized as citizens by the Constitution, is an injury to the country if those excluded have at least the average virtue and intelligence of the voting class. I claim that the women of the United States are the equals in intelligence and the superiors in virtue and good intention to the men, and that their influence at the polls would purify elections and give us a better class of public officials. The State would therefore be benefited by their votes.

It cannot be insisted that women do not need the ballot for self-protection while laws exist in so many States putting them under disabilities as to property, inheritance, business, and even the custody of their children.

This movement grows year by year. It has passed the period of ridicule, both in this country and in England. Earnest men and women, of the highest character, are devoted to the still further application of the principle that there shall not be taxation without representation. Already women vote in two Territories of the United States. In some of the States they vote for the election of school boards. Kansas and Michigan have recently submitted constitutional amendments to their people giving the right of suffrage to women, and one-third of the voters cast their ballots for it—men only voting. Such a result would have been extraordinary ten or five years ago. Colorado has required the question to be submitted in its new constitution.

But the advocates of this measure should not be left to the Herculean labor of applying to the States in detail. The colored man would never have had a vote, left to that process. Congress should fairly submit the question to the people, as is its custom in such matters; and the people can be safely trusted to decide it rightly.

I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. McCREERY. At the request of a fair lady of varied acquirements and of acknowledged capacity, I present the petition of 30 men and 66 women, citizens of Kentucky, praying for a sixteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibiting the several States from disfranchising citizens of the United States on account of sex. I move its reference to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAMLIN. I present a petition signed by 78 men and 70 women of the State of Maine, being similar in its import, I believe word for word, with those presented by the Senator from California and the Senator from Kentucky. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present the petition of Sarah Langdon Williams, Richard Mott, and others—403 men and 425 women—828 citizens of the State of Ohio, praying for a sixteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibiting the several States from disfranchising United States citizens on account of sex. I move its reference to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. THURMAN. I have been requested to present a similar petition from 90 men and 109 women of the State of Kansas. I will say, looking at this petition, that all the signatures appear to be in the same handwriting; but I infer from the indorsements on the back that it is a copy of an original petition which has been presented in the House of Representatives. As the lady who sent this to me is a lady of character, integrity, and varied acquirements, I have no doubt that this is an honest petition, and I move that it be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. I understand it to be a fact that the petition presented by the Senator is a copy of an original petition yesterday presented in the House of Representatives.

Mr. THURMAN. So I understand. I also present a petition praying for an amendment to the pension laws. The petition is signed very numerously by citizens of Marion County, Ohio, most of whom were officers and soldiers in the late war. I move its reference to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. I present the petition of Julie B. Hunt, E. S. Hammond, A. P. Lillie, and others—76 men and 127 women—203 citizens of the State of Massachusetts, praying for a sixteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, prohibiting the several States from disfranchising United States citizens on account of sex. This, as the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] observed of the paper presented by him, is upon its face a copy, and I make the same inference that the Senator from Ohio did, that it is a copy of a petition or attached to another petition which has been presented in the other branch. I desire to say in reference to it that the subject-matter of this petition is engaging the attention of both political parties in my own State to some extent, and that the members of both political parties are committing themselves to it. I think the better way would be to pass upon its merits rather than to give it the go-by in any other way. I move its reference to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES presented the petition of Lucinda Hervey, a pensioner, praying that for the peculiar reasons set forth her pension may, by special act, be made to date back to the time of injury received; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DAWES. I also desire to present the petition of W. H. Dunbar and many other citizens and soldiers in the late war, praying for legislation to remedy what they deem to be, and in which I agree with them, the unjust limitations upon the pension laws. I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. INGALLS. The Committee on Pensions have reported a bill relating to the subject, and I suggest that the petition lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will lie on the table, a bill being upon the Calendar upon the subject.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I present the petition of C. W. Church, Adell M. Garrigues, Catharine X. Odin, Margaret Hinman, and others—181 men and 248 women—429 citizens of the State of Michigan, asking for a sixteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibiting the several States from disfranchising United States citizens on account of sex. I move its reference to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I present the petition of 3 men and 7 women of Guilford Center, citizens of the State of Vermont, including Sarah M. Lynde and S. H. Edwards, praying for a sixteenth amendment to the Constitution prohibiting the several States from disfranchising citizens of the United States on account of sex. This purports to be a copy for the Senate; I suppose the original has been presented in the other House. I move its reference to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WINDOM. I present the petition of Sarah Burger Stearns, Susan C. Burger, 37 men and 25 women, 62 in all, citizens of Minnesota, praying for a sixteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibiting the several States from disfranchising United States citizens on account of sex. I move its reference to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL. I present the petition of Lucinda F. Proebstel,

Sarah J. Riggs, E. P. Henderson, and others—204 men and 280 women—484 citizens of the State of Oregon, praying for a sixteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibiting the several States from disfranchising United States citizens on account of sex. I move its reference to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL presented the petition of George A. Eades, late collector of customs at Sitka, Alaska, praying that he be allowed a credit for moneys lost on the steamer George S. Wright, shipwrecked on the Pacific coast; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I present the petition of Lucinda B. Chandler, Sarah H. Hurn, Charles Butler, and others—66 men and 136 women—being 202 citizens of the State of New Jersey, praying for a sixteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibiting the several States from disfranchising United States citizens on account of sex. I move its reference to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. Expressing my very great pleasure that the ladies of the country are being heard from this morning upon this all-important question, I regret very much that I have not a petition of a similar character; but I have a petition from some gentlemen who want to be relieved from some burdens in the way of taxation. I present a petition signed by Samuel Merrill and some 40 other citizens of Iowa, praying that the taxation upon bank circulation and deposits may be removed. I move its reference to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have the peculiar pleasure and honor of presenting a petition from 105 beautiful, intelligent, and accomplished ladies of Missouri, and 132 men, making 238 citizens of the great State of Missouri, praying for a sixteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, prohibiting the several States from disfranchising United States citizens on account of their sex. I move its reference to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. At the request of Mrs. Sara J. Spencer, president of the Women's Franchise Association of the District of Columbia, I am requested to present the petition of Caroline S. Broomall, Adelaide Thompson, Cornelia H. Scarborough, and others—249 men and 314 women—563 in all, citizens of the State of Pennsylvania, praying for a sixteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibiting the several States from disfranchising United States citizens on account of sex. I present this petition with pleasure, of course, but I will suggest to the ladies, as all these petitions have been apparently gotten up by the same hand, that it would be better and it would have saved a great deal of time in the Senate if they had made up one petition and send it to one Senator. I would have taken great pleasure in presenting it, and it would have saved the necessity of presenting fifteen or twenty like those presented to-day. I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. KERNAN. By request, I present the petition of the New York State Temperance Society—J. N. Stearns, president, J. H. Bronson, secretary—praying prohibitory legislation for the District of Columbia and the Territories; the prohibition of the foreign importation of alcoholic liquors; that total abstinence be made a condition of the civil, military, and naval service; and for a constitutional amendment to prohibit the traffic in alcoholic beverages throughout the national domain. I move its reference to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. KERNAN presented the petition of Norman S. Mills, Orson Richmond, and other citizens of Rockwells, New York, praying for a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic; also for the prohibition of the manufacture, importation, and sale of alcoholic beverages in the District of Columbia and the Territories; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. KERNAN. I also present what I believe to be a copy of a petition presented in the House of Representatives, signed by Lillie Devereaux Blake, Matilda Joslyn Gage, Mrs. E. P. Miller, M. D., and others—being 370 men and 487 women—857 citizens of the State of New York, praying for a sixteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, prohibiting the several States from disfranchising United States citizens on account of sex. I move its reference to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN presesented the petition of Carlos Morgan, A. Ames, and other citizens of Queensbury, New York, praying for a general law to prohibit the liquor traffic within the national jurisdiction; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ALLISON. I present the petition of Janet Strong, R. J. Andrews, N. R. Allen, and others—226 men and 449 women—675 citizens of the State of Iowa, praying for a sixteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibiting the several States from disfranchising United States citizens on account of sex. This is a copy for the Senate of the original, which has been presented to the House of Representatives. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. ROBERTSON presented the petition of William Butler, of South Carolina, praying the removal of his political disabilities; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented the petition of Francis Lynch, of Cheraw, South Carolina, praying compensation for subsistence stores furnished the United States Army in 1865; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BOGY presented the petition of Annie R. Irvine, Charlotte Curtis, Virginia W. Mason, and others—62 men and 88 women—150 citizens of the State of Missouri, praying for a sixteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, prohibiting the several States from disfranchising United States citizens on account of sex; which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

He also presented the memorial of the duly authorized delegation of the Creek or Muscogee Nation of Indians, praying for relief to the orphans of the Creek Nation under the treaty with that tribe of 1832; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. CONKLING. I present a memorial signed by many highly respectable citizens of the State of New York, remonstrating against the passage of Senate bill No. 1056, entitled "A bill concerning commerce and navigation and the regulation of steam-vessels and sailing vessels." I move its reference to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORTON presented the petition of Edward S. Pope, Jesse W. Weill, Mrs. J. H. Parker, and others—43 men and 35 women—78 citizens of the State of Indiana, praying for a sixteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, prohibiting the several States from disfranchising United States citizens on account of sex; which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present quite a number of petitions from citizens of Ohio, asking for a repeal of the unjust limitation debarring pensioners from receiving their just dues and that they may be entitled to receive in all cases pensions from the date of discharge. I move that the petition lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT presented the petition of L. G. Martin and George N. Lamphere, praying for compensation for additional services in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SARGENT. I also present the petition of the California Powder Works of San Francisco, the Giant Powder Company of San Francisco, E. J. Du Pont and De Mours & Co.'s Powder Company of Wilmington, Delaware, and the Hazzard Powder Company of Hazzardville, Connecticut, praying for the passage of the bill which I introduced yesterday and had sent to the Committee on Public Lands, authorizing them to purchase certain land belonging to the United States, within the corporate limits of the city of Salt Lake. The reasons for it are set out at length in their petition, and it is accompanied by a map. I will state that, on such examination as I have been able to give the subject, I think it is a case where legislation should be had, and I favor it. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I have received from the State of New York, I take it from a pension agent, several petitions, signed by citizens in all parts of the country, asking for a change in the statutes which seem to limit pensioners to pensions from the date of their application. Instead of that, these petitioners pray that it may be amended so that they may receive pensions from the time of their injuries. I move that the petitions lie on the table, as I understand there is a bill pending on the subject.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I also present the petition of Morris P. Titus, a citizen of Vermont; the petition of David Bryant, of Post Mills, Vermont; the petition of Hiram D. Monroe, of Town Line, New York, all received from the same source, praying for an amendment to the fifteenth section of the act to revise, and consolidate, and amend the laws relating to pensions, extending the time of limitation for obtaining arrears. I move that these petitions lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I present the petition of J. L. M. Curry, of Virginia, praying for the removal of his political disabilities. The petition is in the form of a letter addressed to me; but it is substantially an application for the removal of his disabilities. A bill passed the House at the Forty-second Congress and was reported by the Senate committee for this purpose, but was not acted upon. I move that this petition be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL presented a resolution of the Legislature of Vermont, in favor of such legislation as will bring about a gradual and early return to specie payments; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. INGALLS presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of Kansas, instructing their Senators and requesting their Representatives to oppose any legislation changing the provisions of the act relating to the sale of the Osage ceded lands; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SPENCER presented the petition of Mrs. A. G. Riddle, R. J. Meigs, Fred. Douglass, Mary F. Foster, and others—310 men, and 438 women—748 citizens of the District of Columbia, praying for a sixteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, prohibiting the several States from disfranchising United States citizens on account of sex; which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WRIGHT. I am instructed by the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 717) for the relief of Nelson Taylor, of Alexandria, Louisiana, to report the same back and recommend its indefinite postponement.

Mr. WEST. I should like to have that bill go on the Calendar. I do not know anything about it, but I should like to have an opportunity to look into it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the bill will be placed on the Calendar and the report will be printed. The Chair hears none.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CHAFFEE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1164) for the relief of the heirs of Anthony Schwörer; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WALLACE (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No 1165) for the relief of Henry G. Healy; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. KERNAN (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1166) to provide for the further rdistribution of the moneys received under the Geneva award; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORTON. I beg leave to introduce a bill, which I do by request. I am not myself acquainted with the details of the bill, but I present it at the request of very respectable and intelligent gentlemen. I ask to have it read and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 1167) to incorporate the Rand Gas-light Company of the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

INDIAN SCHOOL FUNDS.

Mr. DORSEY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs inquire whether there is any reason to believe that any portion of the school fund of the five tribes inhabiting the Indian Territory has been diverted to other uses, and whether any debts have been incurred by said tribes, and what legislation is necessary on this subject.

ORDER IN THE GALLERIES.

Mr. SHERMAN. I submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms is hereby instructed to arrest, without further order, any person who by applause or dissent in the gallery shall disturb the order of the Senate, and hold him subject to the order of the Senate.

I will state that this is a copy of the rule adopted by the Senate unanimously in 1866 at a time of some excitement, and it was posted up and operated much more effectually than the order for clearing the galleries. A motion to clear the galleries does injustice sometimes to ten persons while excluding the one engaged in a disturbance. This rule after being adopted was in force several years and operated very well. I ask the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not know whether I shall be opposed to that resolution or not; but I should like to think about it a little. There is no one more opposed than I am to any such manifestations of applause or dissent in the gallery. I have so often expressed myself to that effect that it is not necessary for me to do so again. But arresting persons when you may sometimes arrest innocent persons, too, is a somewhat serious business. I think the resolution proposed had better go to the Committee on Rules or lie over until to-morrow.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will state to my colleague that in 1860 substantially the same rule was adopted by the Senate; and in 1866 when such scenes as occurred here yesterday were common this rule was adopted and was found to work very well. The Sergeant-at-Arms did what it seems to me he ought to do without a rule—station his officers around and whenever there was an apparent sign of applause or the like a simple suggestion put an end to it. As a matter of course, the galleries are changing every day and what has been done to-day may not be known to those who come to our galleries afterward. A simple sign of applause will be followed up at once, and so disturb the order of the Senate.

As a matter of course, I have no objection to the resolution lying over; but this rule was practiced upon for four years since my colleague has been a member of the Senate. It was adopted in 1866, and for several years afterward cards were posted around the corridors giving notice to everybody that it was the order of the Senate. In fact I think it is now a standing order of the Senate because on its face it was to continue for all time, though probably it was dropped by there being no occasion to enforce it. I have no objection to the resolution going over until to-morrow when I will call it up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie over.

LOUIS ROSE.

Mr. SARGENT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1034) for the relief of Louis Rose.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill provides that all claim of title of the United States to blocks 93 and 94 in the city of San Diego, California, as designated and described on the map made by Charles H. Poole, in or about the year 1856, for the authorities of the city, (being blocks numbered 54 and 56 on the map made in or about the year 1849 by Cave J. Couts, lieutenant United States Army,) is quitclaimed and released to Louis Rose, the equitable owner of those blocks.

Mr. SARGENT. The bill was reported by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] with the unanimous assent of the Committee on Private Land Claims. The report is of considerable length. The case is a very clear one. I suppose he can condense in a brief space any explanation that is desired. It is a case, as I understand, where the United States took certain property without compensation, never made any improvement upon it, never used it since, and has no use for it now; and this proposition is simply to give it back to the person from whom it was taken, who has a clear title except for this cloud by the United States. There is no public or private reason why it should be retained by the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TROOPS AT PETERSBURGH ON ELECTION DAY.

Mr. WITHERS. If there be no further morning business, I would ask the indulgence of the Senate for a few moments to take up for consideration the message of the President of the United States in reference to the occupancy of Petersburgh, Virginia, by the military in order that I may submit the remarks I proposed to submit in reply to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] the other day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of that message? The Chair hears none, and it is before the Senate.

Mr. WITHERS. Mr. President, I shall be very brief in what I have to say in regard to this matter. Upon reading the report of the speech of the Senator from Indiana the other day, I find that the principal point to which he addressed his remarks was the view that he alleges I entertain of the power of the General Government to occupy the States of this Union, at its discretion, by any portion of the Army of the United States. I do not suppose it is necessary for me to defend myself at all from the effort which was made by the Senator to commit me to the proposition, which I never entertained or designed to express, of denying the power of the President to move any portion of the troops through the States at any time, within the line of duty. That proposition may have had some color of right from the rather loose expressions incident to a discussion without the use of a written speech; but the very expressions which I used and the whole line and tenor of my argument were addressed to the point, not that the Government had no power to send troops through the States, but that it had not power to occupy the territory of a State by the military without the consent of the State government and on application of the State authorities.

I dissent entirely from the doctrine so broadly laid down by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] and the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] that the Government of the United States has the right, the legal and constitutional right, to occupy with the Army of the United States any of the States of this Union at its pleasure. I do not believe that any such power is granted by the Constitution. On the contrary, I believe it is in direct opposition both to the letter and spirit of that instrument.

We all know that the fourth section of the fourth article of the Constitution specifies the conditions on which the Government of the United States can send troops to or occupy in a military sense any of the States of this Union. And in support of this position I rely not alone on the language of the Constitution, but on the adjudications by the Supreme Court of the United States of the different articles of the Constitution connected with this subject.

It is, I presume, an established and admitted fact that the tenth article of the amendments to the Constitution, wherein it is stated that the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively or to the people, is accepted as the doctrine by which we are to be controlled in the consideration of this and all other constitutional questions involving the relative powers of the General Government and of the States. I will quote in this connection the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, and the unanimous opinion of that court, as pronounced in the case of Collector vs. Day, found in Wallace's Reports, volume 14, page 112. The Supreme Court of the United States there declares:

> It is a familiar rule of construction of the Constitution of the Union, that the sovereign powers vested in the State governments by their respective constitutions remain unaltered and unimpaired, except so far as they were granted to the Government of the United States. That the intention of the framers of the Constitution in this respect might not be misunderstood this rule of interpretation is expressly declared in the tenth article of amendments, namely, "the powers not delegated to the United States are reserved to the states respectively, or to the people." The Government of the United States, therefore, can claim no powers which are not granted to it by the Constitution, and the powers actually granted must be such as are expressly given, or given by necessary implication.

Now I would ask the Senator from Indiana to point to that clause of the Constitution which gives to the General Government this power of entering upon and occupying with its Army any portion of the territory of a State. I do not think he can find any such clause. I am fully aware of the fact that this instrument, among the powers which are given to Congress, enumerates these: "to raise and support armies," "to provide and maintain a navy," and "to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces," and if the Constitution were silent in every other regard, I would admit that by necessary implication to the carrying out of the powers hereby granted, the Government would have the right to place its troops at any point within the broad limits of this nation whenever caprice, inclination, or judgment might render it desirable. But, sir, we are not left to implication, because the Constitution itself expressly provides the means of furnishing a place of abode and accommodation for its Army. If there were not a specific provision of the Constitution the argument would be a good one that we had the right to infer the power from the power to raise armies, because the power to create and raise an army involves of necessity the power of supporting and providing for the accommodation of that army; but we find that this same instrument prescribes the mode in which this Army and this Navy shall be provided with accommodations. It is found in the seventeenth paragraph of the eighth section of the first article:

> The Congress shall have power—
> To exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever, over such district (not exceeding ten miles square) as may, by cession of particular States, and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of the Government of the United States, and to exercise like authority over all places purchased by the consent of the Legislature of the State in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dock-yards, and other needful buildings;—and
> To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers, &c.

There is a clause of the Constitution itself providing quarters for the accommodation of its Army and its Navy. In those localities they have acquired and assert supreme and exclusive jurisdiction; and it is to these points that it was designed by the framers of the Constitution that the military force of the Government should be restricted except when absent on necessary and legal duty.

Now, sir, my position is this: That the Constitution having prescribed the places which should be provided for the accommodation of the Army, having in addition prescribed that the Government should have no power to intervene with its Army in the affairs of a State except in two specified condition of things, neither of which is alleged to have existed in this instance, the President of the United States transcended his constitutional powers in occupying with his Army a portion of the State of Virginia when the conditions required by the Constitution for such occupancy did not exist. My friend from Missouri [Mr. BOGY] suggests that under the broad construction given by the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Indiana, the President could concentrate the whole Army here in Washington at his pleasure. He has much greater power to do that than he had to commit the act of which I complain, because the District of Columbia is under the control of Congress and the Government of the United States by special cession. He may have here the power, and he has a color of legal authority which does not exist in the other case at all.

Sir, we may be old-fashioned and it may be that we are deserving of the censure which is impliedly cast upon us in attempting here to enunciate the doctrine that the States have any rights. But when we know that the Constitution of the United States itself sustains us, when we know that we have the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States to sustain us in the position which we take, wherein it asserts in the broadest terms that all the powers not granted by the Constitution to the United States are reserved by the States or the people—when we have these it will take more than the dogmatic utterances of either of the Senators to convince me that our position is as untenable as they would have you believe.

With regard to the incidents of the affair in Petersburgh, upon which the Senator from Indiana commented and from which he so largely quoted, I have very little to say. Because when I find that a Senator of the distinguished ability which characterizes the Senator from Indiana is driven by the arguments of my colleague to assert that the affidavit of White read by me denying in the broadest terms that he had ever signed the pretended affidavit certifying to acts of violence in Petersburgh in May last, or to the necessity of having troops there to enable the colored people to vote, acted under compulsion—when he is forced to the avowal of a belief that this witness was bull-dozed or intimidated into giving this testimony, at the time and under the circumstances existing, I submit that argument is exhausted. At a time when the Army of the United States was in the city in which it was given, when a special session of the United States court was then being held there, for the special purpose of protecting all persons in the enjoyment of their rights; and when an array of two or three hundred deputy marshals of the United States were swarming all over the city, that at such a time if this bull-dozing and terrorism could be exercised, it seems to me it would be exceedingly difficult for the Senator to find any occasion where it would not be possible.

I leave this whole matter with this statement of the condition of affairs at that place and time, and of the belief of the Senator from Indiana. Of course, he is entitled to his own belief. No person can question his right to believe what he pleases.

I do not wish to occupy the attention of the Senate this morning because I know it is designed to be appropriated to the consideration of a very important matter; but before I sit down I will merely allude to a point made by the Senator from Ohio, who, with his characteristic adroitness, sought to shift the issue from the question of the credibility of the witnesses or of the forgery of the testimony upon which this action was taken, to a mere difference of opinion between this man William White and President Grant as to the propriety of the occupancy of Petersburgh by the military on the day of election. The true point at issue was as to the credibility of the testimony upon which this action was based; and I have submitted proof to my mind conclusive—not so conclusive, perhaps, to the mind of the Senator—that a portion at least of the evidence on which this action was taken consisted of certificates that were forged, not bona fide certificates, and the question then being whether these forged certificates, presented thus in an ex parte manner, without any opportunity afforded the mayor or citizens to present rebutting evidence, were sufficient to justify the action taken in the case. The Senator from Ohio seems to think it was merely a difference of opinion between the witness White and the President of the United States.

Now, Mr. President, in conclusion of this whole matter, I will repeat to some extent the declaration I made the other day, that it was not the number of troops, it was not the allegation that they committed any wrongful act while in the city of Petersburgh, that caused my remonstrance or that induced me to invite the attention of the Senate to this particular case, but it was the principle which it involved, the broad assertion of the right on the part of the President of the United States to send the Army of the United States to any portion of this country that in his discretion he might deem necessary at any election to supervise and control it, if it was his will and pleasure to do so. That right I believed dangerous to the liberties of the country. That is a right which I am not willing to concede to him; and it makes not one particle of difference to me whether the occupant of the presidential chair be a republican or a democrat, it is a power which if conceded is dangerous to the liberties of the people, and, if acquiesced in generally by the people, can result in but one thing, and that is the destruction of freedom in this Government and the establishment of a military despotism upon its ruins. Such is my opinion, and therefore I maintain the positions which I asserted.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, but a word. I stated the position of the Senator from Virginia the other day as I understood it from reading his speech. I now will state his position this morning as I understand him to define it; and that is that the President of the United States, as Commander-in-Chief of the Army, has no right to have troops in any State of this Union temporarily or permanently, unless that place be a "fort, magazine, arsenal, or dock-yard;" that the Army of the United States must be confined, and must live and have its being entirely in a fort, a magazine, an arsenal, or a dock-yard. If I do not state the position of the distinguished Senator correctly, I want him to correct me.

Mr. WITHERS. Permanent occupancy in a military sense.

Mr. MORTON. I do not know what the Senator means by "permanent." If he means by "permanent" staying from year to year, then this occupation of the custom-house at Petersburgh would not be permanent and would not be within his proposition, would not be within his argument, and therefore would not be censurable. The occupation of the custom-house at Petersburgh was but for a few days, perhaps a week or ten days; but that was such an occupation as to make it illegal, says the Senator, and therefore the Army of the United States can stay nowhere in the bounds of a State except it be in a fort, an arsenal, a magazine, or a dock-yard.

I understand that the President of the United States has a right to quarter the troops in any State anywhere in time of peace, not saying anything about a time of war, so that private rights are not invaded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the Senator will be permitted to finish what he has to say.

Mr. MORTON. I shall finish what I have to say in a few minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the Senator from Indiana will proceed.

Mr. MORTON. The third article of amendments to the Constitution provides:

> No soldier shall, in time of peace, be quartered in any house, without the consent of the owner, nor in time of war, but in a manner to be prescribed by law.

That is a limitation in the Constitution. The inference is that they may be quartered anywhere in time of peace except in a house. The Army of the United States could hardly be organized, it could hardly be maintained, it would be of but very little use if it was to live and have its being and must remain all the time in a fort, arsenal, magazine, or dock-yard.

I hardly think it is necessary, Mr. President, to pursue the argument.

Mr. WITHERS. I rise only to say a word. I shall not consume two minutes in reply to the Senator from Indiana, because silence might leave me in a false position. I have stated distinctly, and I did state in my original speech, that the law of elections gave some color of right, some color of law to this occupancy; and the great object to which my remarks were addressed was to secure the attention of the Committee on the Judiciary to this subject and to the abuses which were clearly incident to such construction of the law as was placed by the Attorney-General in his circular of instructions. I should state in this connection that in my opinion the construction given to that law by the Attorney-General would make the law itself.

if properly susceptible of that construction, contravene the provisions of the Constitution.

I have never denied the right of soldiers to pass in transitu through any portion of the country when on duty. The passage of the Constitution read by the Senator, it does not seem to me, is fairly susceptible of the deduction which he draws from it; but, on the contrary, it sustains my position; for the Constitution expressly says the troops shall not be quartered in a house without consent of the owner, and it also says that private property shall not be taken for public use, &c. I think I have a much greater right to infer from that article of the Constitution that the protection being thus thrown around private rights, the soldiers of the United States have no right to occupy any portion of the territory of a State, but are restricted to the Territory of the United States, except, of course, with consent. Now, what I complain of in Petersburgh is that troops were sent there not in accordance with the Constitution, but under the color of this election law, the construction of which, I believe, was an erroneous one; and that they were sent there for the purpose of controlling and influencing the election; that their presence there did thus influence the election; and I endeavored to deduce from these facts the inference that the power which was thus claimed and exercised was one dangerous to the liberties of the country. That was all.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had receded from its amendment to the bill (S. No. 155) to amend sections 533, 556, 571, and 572 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to courts in Arkansas and other States.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 231) for the relief of Robert Erwin; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1850) granting a pension to Harvey B. Kilbourn, private in Company C, Thirtieth Regiment Pennsylvania Militia.

THE ALABAMA CLAIMS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, communicating a report from the Secretary of State, with accompanying papers, relating to the court of commissioners of Alabama claims; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

COUNTING OF THE ELECTORAL VOTES.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will lay the unfinished business before the Senate, being the resolution offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALLACE] to instruct the special committee on counting the electoral vote for President and Vice-President to inquire and report upon certain propositions in connection therewith.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to postpone the present and all prior orders and take up Senate bill No. 1153, touching the counting of the electoral vote.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 1153) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877, which is as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Senate and House of Representatives shall meet in the Hall of the House of Representatives, at the hour of one o'clock p. m., on the first Thursday in February, A. D. 1877; and the President of the Senate shall be their presiding officer. Two tellers shall be previously appointed on the part of the Senate and two on the part of the House of Representatives, to whom shall be handed, as they are opened by the President of the Senate, all the certificates, and papers purporting to be certificates, of the electoral votes, which certificates and papers shall be opened, presented, and acted upon in the alphabetical order of the States, beginning with the letter A; and said tellers, having then read the same in the presence and hearing of the two Houses, shall make a list of the votes as they shall appear from the said certificates; and the votes having been ascertained and counted as in this act provided, the result of the same shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall thereupon announce the state of the vote, and the names of the persons, if any, elected, which announcement shall be deemed a sufficient declaration of the persons elected President and Vice-President of the United States, and, together with a list of the votes, be entered on the Journals of the two Houses. Upon such reading of any such certificate or paper when there shall be only one return from a State, the President of the Senate shall call for objections, if any. Every objection shall be made in writing, and shall state clearly and concisely, and without argument, the ground thereof, and shall be signed by at least one Senator and one Member of the House of Representatives before the same shall be received. When all objections so made to any vote or paper from a State shall have been received and read, the Senate shall thereupon withdraw, and such objections shall be submitted to the Senate for its decision; and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall, in like manner, submit such objections to the House of Representatives for its decision; and no electoral vote or votes from any State from which but one return has been received shall be rejected except by the affirmative vote of the two Houses. When the two Houses have voted, they shall immediately again meet, and the presiding officer shall then announce the decision of the question submitted.

SEC. 2. That if more than one return or paper purporting to be a return from a State shall have been received by the President of the Senate, purporting to be the certificates of electoral votes given at the last preceding election for President and Vice-President in such State, (unless they shall be duplicates of the same return,) all such returns and papers shall be opened by him in the presence of the two Houses when met as aforesaid and read by the tellers, and all such returns and papers shall thereupon be submitted to the judgment and decision, as to which is the true and lawful electoral vote of such State, of a commission constituted as follows, namely:

During the session of each House on the Tuesday next preceding the first Thursday in February, 1877, each House shall, by viva voce vote, appoint five of its members, who, with the five associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, to be ascertained as hereinafter provided, shall constitute a commission for the decision of all questions upon or in respect of such double returns named in this section.

On the Tuesday next preceding the first Thursday in February, A. D. 1877, or as soon thereafter as may be, the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States now assigned to the first, third, eighth, and ninth circuits shall select, in such manner as a majority of them shall deem fit, another of the associate justices of said court, which five persons shall be members of said commission, and the person longest in commission of said five justices shall be president of said commission. The members of said commission shall respectively take and subscribe the following oath:

"I, ——— ———, do solemnly swear (or affirm, as the case may be) that I will impartially examine consider all questions submitted to the commission of which I am a member, and a true judgment give thereon, agreeably to the Constitution and the laws: so help me God;" which oath shall be filed with the Secretary of the Senate.

When the commission shall have been thus organized, it shall not be in the power of either House to dissolve the same, or to withdraw any of its members; but if any such Senator or member shall die or become physically unable to perform the duties required by this act, the fact of such death or physical inability shall be by said commission, before it shall proceed further, communicated to the Senate or House of Representatives, as the case may be, which body shall immediately and without debate proceed by viva voce vote to fill the place so vacated, and the person so appointed shall take and subscribe the oath hereinbefore prescribed, and become a member of said commission; and, in like manner, if any of said justices of the Supreme Court shall die or become physically incapable of performing the duties required by this act, the other of said justices, members of the said commission, shall immediately appoint another justice of said court a member of said commission; and, in such appointments, regard shall be had to the impartiality and freedom from bias sought by the original appointments to said commission, who shall thereupon immediately take and subscribe the oath hereinbefore prescribed, and become a member of said commission to fill the vacancy so occasioned.

All the certificates and papers purporting to be certificates of the electoral votes of each State shall be opened, in the alphabetical order of the States, as provided in section 1 of this act; and when there shall be more than one such certificate or paper, as the certificates and papers from such State shall so be opened, (excepting duplicates of the same return,) they shall be read by the tellers, and thereupon the President of the Senate shall call for objections, if any. Every objection shall be made in writing and shall state clearly and concisely, and without argument, the ground thereof, and shall be signed by at least one Senator and one member of the House of Representatives before the same shall be received. When all such objections so made to any certificate, vote, or paper from a State shall have been received and read, all such certificates, votes, and papers so objected to, and all papers accompanying the same, together with such objections, shall be forthwith submitted to said commission, which shall proceed to consider the same, with the same powers, if any, now possessed for that purpose by the two Houses acting separately or together, and, by a majority of votes, decide whether any and what votes from such State are the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States, and how many and what persons were duly appointed electors in such State, and may therein take into view such petitions, depositions, and other papers, if any, as shall, by the Constitution and now existing law, be competent and pertinent in such consideration; which decision shall be made in writing, stating briefly the ground thereof, and signed by the members of said commission agreeing thereto; whereupon the two Houses shall again meet, and such decision shall be read and entered in the Journal of each House, and the counting of the votes shall proceed in conformity therewith, unless upon objection made thereto in writing by at least five Senators and five members of the House of Representatives, the two Houses shall separately concur in ordering otherwise, in which case such concurrent order shall govern. No votes or papers from any other State shall be acted upon until the objections previously made to the votes or papers from any State shall have been finally disposed of.

SEC. 3. That while the two Houses shall be in meeting, as provided in this act, no debate shall be allowed and no question shall be put by the presiding officer, except to either House on a motion to withdraw; and he shall have power to preserve order.

SEC. 4. That when the two Houses separate to decide upon an objection that may have been made to the counting of any electoral vote or votes from any State, or upon objection to a report of said commission, or other question arising under this act, each Senator and Representative may speak to such objection or question ten minutes, and not oftener than once; but after such debate shall have lasted two hours, it shall be the duty of each House to put the main question without further debate.

SEC. 5. That at such joint meeting of the two Houses, seats shall be provided as follows: For the President of the Senate, the Speaker's chair; for the Speaker, immediately upon his left; the Senators in the body of the Hall upon the right of the presiding officer; for the Representatives, in the body of the Hall not provided for the Senators; for the tellers, Secretary of the Senate, and Clerk of the House of Representatives, at the Clerk's desk; for the other officers of the two Houses, in front of the Clerk's desk and upon each side of the Speaker's platform. Such joint meeting shall not be dissolved until the count of electoral votes shall be completed and the result declared; and no recess shall be taken unless a question shall have arisen in regard to counting any such votes, or otherwise under this act, in which case it shall be competent for either House, acting separately, in the manner hereinbefore provided, to direct a recess of such House not beyond the next day, Sunday excepted, at the hour of ten o'clock in the forenoon. And while any question is being considered by said commission, either House may proceed with its legislative or other business.

SEC. 6. That nothing in this act shall be held to impair or affect any right now existing under the Constitution and laws to question, by proceeding in the judicial courts of the United States, the right or title of the person who shall be declared elected, or who shall claim to be President or Vice-President of the United States, if any such right exists.

SEC. 7. That said commission shall make its own rules, keep a record of its proceedings, and shall have power to employ such persons as may be necessary for the transaction of its business and the execution of its powers.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, as a fitting commencement of the consideration of this bill, I ask the Secretary to read the twelfth article of the amendments to the Constitution of the United States, which the bill proposes to execute.

The Secretary read as follows:

The electors shall meet in their respective States and vote by ballot for President and Vice-President, one of whom, at least, shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves; they shall name in their ballots the person voted for as President, and in distinct ballots the person voted for as Vice-President, and they shall make distinct lists of all persons voted for as President, and of all persons voted for as Vice-President, and of the number of votes for each; which lists

they shall sign and certify, and transmit, sealed, to the seat of Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate. The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted;—the person having the greatest number of votes for President, shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed; and if no person have such majority, then from the persons having the highest numbers not exceeding three on the list of those voted for as President, the House of Representatives shall choose immediately, by ballot, the President. But in choosing the President, the votes shall be taken by States, the representation from each State having one vote; a quorum for this purpose shall consist of a member or members from two-thirds of the States, and a majority of all the States shall be necessary to a choice. And if the House of Representatives shall not choose a President whenever the right of choice shall devolve upon them, before the 4th day of March, next following, then the Vice-President shall act as President, as in the case of the death or other constitutional disability of the President. The person having the greatest number of votes as Vice President shall be the Vice-President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed; and if no person have a majority, then from the two highest numbers on the list the Senate shall choose the Vice-President; a quorum for the purpose shall consist of two-thirds of the whole number of Senators, and a majority of the whole number shall be necessary to a choice. But no person constitutionally ineligible to the office of President shall be eligible to that of Vice President of the United States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Under this article of the Constitution, Mr. President, some eight or ten millions of the citizens of the United States, authorized by the laws to select a chief magistrate in the way prescribed in this article, have endeavored to execute that duty; and by a very evenly balanced number of voices, when you take them as a whole, they are understood to have expressed their preference for two different persons, representing opposing policies of legislation and of government, greater or less in principle, and greater or less in degree, that it is not necessary for me to refer to. And the contest has been so close, when measured by the constitutional standard of voting by States for electors, that it becomes a matter of serious dispute, either rightly or wrongly, between these five millions of voting citizens upon one side and five millions upon another—I express it merely in round numbers for convenience—which of their respective candidates has been constitutionally elected. And without any provision of law for the execution of what remains to be done under the Constitution in ascertaining what person has received the highest number of electoral votes being a majority of the whole, we are brought face to face with the question of what means are left for deciding the dispute. Undoubtedly a large proportion of the people of the United States on either side of the question sincerely believe that their candidate has been elected, and sincerely believe that if it be not so finally ascertained a great wrong will have been done, not only to their personal rights and wishes but to the cause of constitutional government.

In this state of things, if nothing is to be done, if the Constitution does not now point clearly the way we are to tread so that right-minded men of all parties shall understand it alike, whichever of these candidates obtains the actual possession of executive power will necessarily be looked upon by the friends of the other as a usurper; and if there is any one duty greater than another imposed upon those who have the final execution of what remains to be done in their hands, it is that of, if possible, providing some means that when they are accomplished, no matter what may be the result, all men will say have been taken in the due course of law, and so that all just men will say, whether their wishes are attained or are disappointed, "it is right," just as just men in the administration of justice who look upon the causes that they or their neighbors have tried and determined in a constitutional and lawful way may feel from day to day that a jury in this case or a judge in the other has not decided rightly; yet they would defend with all their power the judgment that they believed to be wrong, because without that civil institutions cannot exist.

So then, Mr. President, it has appeared to us who have been charged with this most onerous and responsible and unpleasant duty that if the Constitution authorized us to lay down a line of procedure that should be clear and definite in itself, and should lead to any result—and I use the words with deliberation—that should lead to any result, no matter which one, through the calm and orderly progress of the administration of law and through the calm and orderly judgment of a tribunal bound by the most solemn obligations to decide according to the Constitution and the law, it would be a beneficent act for the Republic, and, if on the other hand we should fail to do this, our posterity under this form or some other form of government (no man can tell which) would feel that we had failed in the hour of great need in performing a plain duty.

This, then, Mr. President, is the situation; and under this state of things the committee with almost absolute unanimity have reported this bill. Opposing political opinions, opposing political educations, warm wishes, partisan feelings, have subsided on both sides, and what all of us, of all opinions, educations, wishes, and feelings, solemnly unite in reporting to you as a just and upright and lawful way, we recommend to your consideration. What is it that we recommend? I will state:

The first section of this bill provides in the first part of it for the simple ceremony of the necessary union of the two Houses, or meeting, to state it more exactly, on the occasion of determining who has the highest number of votes of the electors for President and Vice-President of the United States. It then proceeds to provide for the cases in which only one set of papers or returns, as they are called, shall have appeared; and in respect of those cases it provides, substantially, and I do not know but literally, what the bill introduced by my honorable friend from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] a year ago, and which passed the Senate, although it was brought back on a motion to reconsider, provided, that no return from a State, about which a question should arise, there being only one return, should be left out of the count unless the two Houses should separately agree that it ought to be left out. The principle upon which that goes is one that is not perfectly satisfactory to my mind, although I do not know that it would have any special stress in the particular emergency which we are now called upon to confront. I only speak of this as my own individual idea, that the first section is not perfectly logical. My own individual opinion would have been that any question about such a paper ought to have been referred to this same tribunal, I use that phrase for convenience, and that it should take the same fate as any other. I need not, however, go into the discussion of that, because I have concurred in leaving it as it stands, and, as we knew, it had been found acceptable to a considerable majority of the Senate; but, as I say, this criticism, if it be one, so far as I know, has no practical application to the present matter that we have to decide. The principle of it I understand to have been, from the discussions of last year and from the discussions in committee, that, if the case were so doubtful that the members of the two Houses acting under such solemn responsibilities could not agree that the paper was not the constitutional vote of the State, the presumption should go in favor of the State.

Then we come to the second section, which covers the difficulties that we have to encounter in the present condition of affairs. The second section provides that, if more than one return or paper purporting to be a return from a State shall have been received by the President of the Senate, purporting to be the certificate of the electoral votes given at the last election, all those returns shall be opened by the President of the Senate, just as the Constitution says in terms that all the certificates shall be opened by him in the presence of the two Houses. They shall be read by the tellers, which the bill provides for the appointment of, according to the universal practice from the foundation of the Government, only, I believe almost always hitherto one teller has been appointed on the part of the Senate and two on the part of the House of Representatives, and this bill provides that there shall be two tellers, an equal number, appointed by each House. Having been read by the tellers, the bill then proceeds to declare that all these double, disputed papers "shall thereupon be submitted to the judgment and decision, as to which is the true and lawful electoral vote of such State, of a commission." You will observe, Mr. President, precisely the question that is to be sent to this tribunal for its consideration. It is to inquire which of the papers of the conflicting ones is the paper that the Constitution calls for; that is, the electoral vote of a State in the Union, as the Constitution says, as it need scarcely have said, but some language must have been employed. It is the constitutional vote of the State, the voice of the State in the manner prescribed by its Legislature in the selection of electors who have voted for President that is to be sought for; and it is the person who has the highest number of those votes—I am not now quoting the language of the Constitution, but what everybody understands it to mean—who is to be the President. Therefore this tribunal, or commission, as it is styled in the bill more accurately, is called upon to determine one single question between two conflicting papers purporting to be the constitutional certificates, and that is, they are to determine which of them is in conformity with the Constitution and which of them is not. It then provides for the appointment of the commission, its method of selection; and I shall have something more to say upon the subject of what they are to decide when I come to a later part of the bill which again refers to what they are to do.

The bill then comes to the selection of the commission. It provides that each House on the Tuesday preceding the first Thursday in February—which changes the day for this occasion to an earlier period than that fixed by the general law, which is the second Wednesday in February—on the Tuesday preceding that day, which I believe in this case is the 30th of January, each House shall by a viva voce vote, the open, public, and solemn personal choice of every member of each House—no secrecy of the ballot; no private combination that must not at last openly display itself; but just as the solemn judgments that we give upon the yeas and nays upon public measures, just as the solemn judgments of courts are given, with all present and each knowing what the opinion of the other is—we are called upon by our own sworn duty to the Constitution and to the law to exercise a personal, a public, a responsible duty in selecting five members in each House to compose a part of this commission. Nobody probably would criticise the propriety of this mode of selection, if you are to say that the commission is to be composed at all of members of either House, for the whole world is to know how each individual Senator and how each individual member of the House of Representatives has performed his responsible duty in the selection of a person who is to become the sworn judge in as great a dispute as probably ever existed in the world under the law.

These ten Senators and members of the House of Representatives selected in that way, with five of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, are to compose a commission of fifteen. The judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, as we all know, are composed now of nine persons; and in order that there might be a certain symmetry of equipoise, of relation, it was thought, after much consideration by the committee, that it was advisable to take an equal number of Senators and an equal number of members of the House of Representatives and an equal number of the persons composing the justices of the Supreme Court to form this commission. So five came naturally to be the number referred to. If it had been thought wise to have made the total number of the commission less, nine for instance as had been suggested, then there would have been three Senators and three members of the House of Representatives and three judges of the Supreme Court; but it appeared to us, after much consideration, that fifteen was, on the whole, the best number, so large as to produce every variety of intellectual capacity and learning and as to produce confidence against any possible attempt that might be made—scarcely conceivable, to be sure—to unduly influence any one or two or three of this whole number by any of the motives that sometimes, as we know in the history of the world, have been led to influence people who are called upon to discharge high trusts, and at the same time to leave the commission so limited in numbers as that it should be capable of prompt, effective consultation, and deliberate and orderly procedure and decision.

Then the next step was to ascertain in what manner these five gentlemen out of the nine—all, of course, pre-eminent in legal learning and in legal experience; all, of course, pre-eminent in their knowledge and study of the Constitution and the laws of our country; all, of course, equal in that deep respect which they receive from the people of every part of the Union, as in every part of it and for every part of it they daily administer law—should be selected. Of course it was a difficult task, because to select a particular five by name might seem to imply that there was some reason personal or other that the other particular part, four, should not be selected. And so, in analogy to what has always been a wise custom in this good Government of ours, it appeared to us that a distribution of these gentlemen to the various parts of the Republic would be a just reason for particular selections. So one named, the justice of the first circuit, comes from the far-off borders of New England, the northeastern part of the country; another, the justice of the third circuit, has his residence and exercises his judicial functions in the center of the great commercial populations of our Union; a third, he who administers justice in the eighth circuit, has his home and residence in the great Northwest; and the fourth, the justice of the ninth circuit, has had his habitation and has administered justice for many years (except, of course, when attending here and administering justice in the Supreme Court) on what has been said to be the golden slope, that great far-off portion of our Republic so rapidly growing in wealth and in everything that makes the material prosperity of a self-governing people. We name them to compose four. Then there was the odd number to be obtained; and in order to guard against prejudice—and I beg Senators to observe my words—to guard against prejudice in the minds of these ten millions of active voters in what has taken place, not to guard against prejudice in judges, not to guard against prejudice in Senators or Members, but to do that wise and wholesome thing, to leave no fault-finder in the country a right to complain, we say these four men shall choose the fifth from among their own associate numbers. In the intense criticisms that have been made upon this bill, in the very few days that it has been known, by the extreme upholders of party wishes upon both sides, I have never observed any criticisms upon the absolute fairness and justice of such a mode, provided we could get over the constitutional objections that these newspaper writers and intense politicians seem so suddenly to have discovered and with which no doubt they are so very familiar.

That then composes a commission of fifteen persons to whom these double returns are to be referred. The bill provides, as we think with great fitness, that the oldest of these associate justices in commission—the venerable Judge Clifford it will be if the bill should pass—shall be the president of it; and it then provides what also I hope that partisans as well as Senators and Representatives will carefully consider, that—

> The members of said commission shall respectively take and subscribe the following oath:
> I, ——— ———, do solemnly swear (or affirm, as the case may be) that I will impartially examine and consider all questions submitted to the commission of which I am a member, and a true judgment give thereon, agreeably to the Constitution and the laws: so help me God.

No more partisan, no more friend, no more opponent, no more enemy, but the solemn judgment of the judge. It appeared to us, Mr. President, that, so far as human institutions can provide for justice under the law, to impose upon five of ourselves, five of the gentlemen of the House of Representatives, and five of these eminent persons in the judicial branch to whom I have referred, that obligation, which each willingly and affirmatively takes, would be to dismiss, with us even, with all the warmth of our wishes, every consideration that should either cloud our intellects or warp our judgments; for what this commission is to decide is not a policy; it is not a future; it is only to pass upon the irrevocable past and to say, as an intellectual answer to the question under the Constitution and the law, and in no other sense and in no other way, what has taken place according to the Constitution, and not what ought to take place or what they could have wished should take place. I repeat, sir, that if there be any value left in the institutions of civil government under law, this is the last and final hope that such institutions can have. There is no human agency, there is nothing short of the overruling providence of the Almighty, that can furnish a juster test of human rights than this.

Having thus constituted the tribunal, we have committed to them this duty: After providing for cases of vacancy, &c., that I need not take your time to speak of, we have committed to them this duty: Objections having been made to these double returns or either of them, in writing, in a formal way, stating the ground of them and without argument, this commission "shall proceed to consider the same, with the same powers, if any, now possessed for that purpose by the two Houses acting separately or together, and, by a majority of votes, decide whether any and what votes from such State are the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States."

That is what they are to decide upon these papers, to ascertain which of the conflicting claimants, as you may say, to the right to have exercised a voice in this election is the constitutional organ of the State. Is not that exactly what the Constitution requires should be ascertained by somebody and in some way? Of course every one will agree that it is, that it is the sole question in a case of dispute, and that no other is conceivable. Whatever constitutional voice a State in this Union has sent to you the Constitution declares shall have its weight, without the right of anybody to impugn or to disregard it. So, as I say, the sole question under the Constitution is, what is the constitutional vote of the State? and so, what is the paper, if any, of the two presented that speaks the constitutional voice of that State according to the methods prescribed by the Constitution itself?

Then it proceeds to say "and how many and what persons were duly appointed electors in such State." This was necessary because in a certain event, of no person having a majority of all the electors appointed, the House of Representatives is called upon by the Constitution to exercise the function of electing the President of the United States. And so it was thought necessary that this tribunal having these papers before it should make a distinct report upon the number of electors that had been lawfully appointed. Of course the words "what persons" would have meant exactly the same without the other words, because, if they decided for one of the two double returns rather than the other, the paper itself would show which were the persons who were named in it. But, as a mere matter of convenience of phraseology, the language is in.

Then it provides, what has been greatly criticised upon both sides of the partisan view of the subject—if I may use that phrase without offense to anybody, and I think I may, for I am a partisan myself—then it provides what has been the subject of criticism, and equally intense, as far as I have observed, from both points of view. Those who wish one of the candidates elected condemn it because it grants too much; those who wish another of the candidates elected condemn it in equally fierce terms because it grants too little; it holds aloft the scale of justice in absolute equipoise and gives nothing to either. What does it say?

> And may therein—

That is, in the decision which is committed to them as to what is the constitutional vote of a State—> take into view such petitions, depositions, and other papers, if any, as shall, by the Constitution and now existing law, be competent and pertinent in such consideration.

There is one party in this country, five millions of these voters to whom I have referred, who desire (I do not say think it can be done, but who desire) that this commission, if created, shall descend below the action of the State authorities and ascertain how many votes were given for this man and that man and the other, with a view, of course, to the success, as they suppose, of their own candidate, if that were done. The other five millions, treating them as a mass, in the same way desire that the law shall be so that they cannot descend behind the action of the authorities of a State, be that action right or wrong, lawful or unlawful. In that state of opposition of claim, what is the simple and obvious principle, not merely of justice and fair play, but of constitutional law, that would apply to such a case?

The election of the President of the United States for the next four years took place on the first Wednesday in December; that is, upon the supposition that some one had a majority of all the electors appointed, taking that for granted; and the simplest provisions of the law, as it appeared to me and to us all to be, should be those that provided that that dispute touching that election which took place on the first Wednesday in December should be decided by the law as it was on the first Wednesday in December; and if by the law as it was on the first Wednesday in December, (and of course it is the same now,) as we say "now existing law," the candidate of one party, his rights measured by that law, is entitled to the office, he ought to have it. This would be a strange republic of law indeed, if after, according to one law, the candidate of one party had been elected, the Congress of the United States or anybody else should make a new law by force of which the candidate of some other party got elected. Of course it would be an outrage upon the principles of government. So that we felt perfectly free, not only free but more than free, we felt it to be our bounden duty, that no right should be affected in respect of the candidates of either of these great parties by the law that we pass, and that the right of A or B to this great office must be determined by the law as it stands on the date of the passage of this act. All that we designed this act to do, and all that it does do, is to provide merely the method, by regular steps of lawful procedure, of ascertaining what the law and the fact was on that first Wednesday in December, 1876.

It has been said by some that this commission, if this law passes, having the powers of the two Houses conferred upon them, may go behind the returns, as the common phrase is. Well, if the two Houses now possess the constitutional power to do that thing, they also possessed it on the first Wednesday in December, and we have only changed the method in the first instance of taking that step. If the two Houses, by the Constitution of the United States, on the first Wednesday in December and now, have no constitutional right to overhaul the action of a sovereign State in its selection under the Constitution of its electors, then this commission has no right to do it.

Now what are we to do? Some say that the two Houses, or any tribunal that is to pass upon a dispute, have the right to go to the bottom, to disregard the action of State authorities, to say that they have exceeded their jurisdiction, or, acting within it, that they have not rightly and purely exercised it. Others say exactly the reverse, and that it would be a far greater injury to the Republic that Congress should assume the power of overhauling the action of States than it would be that once or twice or a dozen times, by the unjust action of the authorities of some State, one President rather than another, should be elected. So each side would desire that this law should be framed to meet its particular views, the one side to have it say in explicit terms "You shall have authority that this act gives to you, because the act gives it to you, to go down and inquire." The other would be glad to have it say in explicit terms "You shall not go down and inquire, whether the law before you authorized any one to go down and inquire or not." What could we do? We could do that just, that simple thing, we thought, that we have done, and that is to say that this presidential election must be settled, and settled only upon the Constitution and the principles of law as they existed when it took place.

Who is to decide what they were when it took place? Exactly the tribunal that must decide everything in the end—whatever tribunal the Constitution and the law constitutes for the purpose of such a decision. This law constitutes a tribunal to decide that very thing, among others. In other words, it is commanded to decide what is the constitutional vote of a State; and in doing that it may take into view any evidence of any kind that the Constitution and the law as it is now makes appropriate to that subject, and not any other. Can anything be more just than that? Would it not be a departure from every principle of justice and of constitutional procedure to do anything else? There we leave it. It must be left somewhere, and it can be left nowhere under ordinary principles of government except in the court (if I may call it a court for the purposes of this illustration) that is bound to decide upon the cause. If you are to leave it to the two Houses, as the bill that passed this body less than a year ago did, without any limitation whatever, with as wide a jurisdiction as it was possible to exist, what have you then? You have large bodies of men, and we all know that, just in proportion as you have large bodies of men, you have a departure, when they are acting together, from that personal sense of individual responsibility to decide according to your intellect and judgment rather than to act with the swift current of warm debate and warm feeling; and you commit the right of these persons in this great contest and controversy, therefore, to a tribunal that is much less likely to be governed by the principles of constitutional law than it is by the feeling and intensity of party wishes and party bias.

Then we require that the decision made by this commission—thus under a special oath to follow the Constitution and the law, and nothing else, and in deciding these rights to follow the law as it is now, for the bill gives them no new law; it only creates them to decide upon the old—shall be reported to the two Houses in writing; and that judgment of theirs shall stand unless the two Houses, acting under the authority of this act, shall separately concur in making another disposition of the subject.

I need not refer, Mr. President, to further details of the bill touching the presidency of the joint meeting nor the mere ceremonious part of the affair about debate and so on. There is this other provision in it, however, that I ought to call attention to:

> That nothing in this act shall be held to impair or affect any right now existing under the Constitution and laws to question, by proceeding in the judicial courts of the United States, the right or title of the person who shall be declared elected or who shall claim to be President or Vice-President of the United States, if any such right exists.

We endeavored to be so careful to injure no man's rights under the Constitution, even in the courts of law afterwards, by any declaration that might be made pursuant to this bill of who is President, as to provide, with the universal assent of all the gentlemen, as I have said, of all parties, that after all this has been gone through with, and we have found who, apparently, and so far as our executive or ministerial or quasi-judicial functions may go, is the President of the United States, if there be now under the Constitution and the laws the right of a true President to question the title of an untrue one, a false one, that right shall still exist unprejudiced by any inference that might be drawn from the passage of this bill and the action under it.

That, sir, is what the committee propose. The next question is—and I had not intended to take so much of your time in the opening explanation of this matter—whether this bill is warranted by the Constitution of the United States. If the Constitution of the United States authorizes any legislation at all in order to guide or regulate the ascertainment of what is the constitutional vote of a State, then I take it nobody will deny probably that this bill is constitutional. But if, as has been contended by some gentlemen, the Constitution has committed the right of deciding who is to be the President of the United States, in the fact that it has committed the right of deciding what is the constitutional vote of a State, to some one or more persons or bodies, then it is said that this bill withdraws that right of decision from that person or body and thereby invades the Constitution that it is on its face designed to promote and to execute. If that be true, it is a fatal objection to the bill. If it be not true, then there is the more reason why the law should provide for a course of proceeding and the ascertainment of the result that the Constitution has not specifically pointed out the steps to reach.

Now I will consider for a few minutes the pretension—and I do not use that term to offend anybody but as a short one—the pretension that this great and most responsible power is devolved upon whoever occupies the chair that you have so happily and so honorably filled for so long a time. I dare say we could all agree that if the Constitution has reposed this deciding power in that chair, we could not wish for a better judge to fill the place; but if it has not reposed it in the occupant of your chair, sir, then no matter how eminent or how learned the gentleman may be who fills it, no matter how completely he may command the respect and confidence of all the people of the United States of all parties, it would be equally an invasion of the best rights of constitutional government if he were to exercise it at all.

The Constitution declares that the electors of the several States who are recognized as officers, functionaries, just as clearly and with just as great importance as it does yours or ours, "shall seal up and certify and transmit to the seat of the Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate, the certificates of the votes which shall have been given for President." Then it declares that—

> The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted.

You will perceive, Mr. President, that if the makers of this Constitution had designed to repose in the President of the Senate the power to decide what was a vote and to determine its disposition, as they had taken pains in every other part of the Constitution in the clearest language to say what the Senate might and might not do, what its powers should be and those of the House of Representatives, as they had taken pains in the clearest way, and with the minutest carefulness of language, to say what powers the President of the United States should exercise, and what powers should not be exercised by any authority, and when in respect of the judicial branch they had also, with the same industrious diligence in conferring delegated powers, carefully enumerated every power of the judiciary, how unfortunate it was, had they designed to confer that power upon that Chair, that they had not used the two words that would have enabled them to say so. It would have saved a vast deal of dispute, and we can scarcely imagine it possible that a body of men, who in every respect had been so critically exact in the devolution of the functions and the powers of this Government, should have remained by mere accident so strangely silent upon perhaps the most important part for the perpetuity of the Republic in peace of any one of the powers that the Constitution created or bestowed.

I say, sir, that it staggers human credulity that if that body of men had designed to turn the President of the Senate into a judge in the most critical of all cases for the well-being of the Republic and in a case where it was foreseen and even known that he himself would be at first and perhaps often afterward, as it happened, the very man who was to profit or to lose by his decision—it staggers human credulity that if they had intended to repose such a deciding power in that Chair, they should not have said so.

But, after all, we must be governed by what the Constitution does say, and I admit if you can imply from it fairly and clearly that the power to open a certificate implies the power to determine upon the legal nature of its contents when it is opened, then the President of the Senate must have that power, because the power is delegated to him, and to no one else, to open all the certificates. It then proceeds to say that the votes shall be counted which are disclosed by the opening of the certificates. It does not say they shall be counted by him. If it had been intended that they should be counted by him, two words would have said so, and two very short words at that. But if it had said they should be counted by him, we should have been a great ways yet from that fundamental and prior question as to what is the legal nature of the thing that he is to enumerate, to count, not to decide. The judge in a tribunal decides; the clerk counts.

The language, then, as everybody agrees, does not say that the President of the Senate shall have the power to count even in the arithmetical sense of the term; much less does it say that he shall have power to decide anything. It says that he shall open all the certificates. Now, suppose we go back a little and inquire, does that imply it? I suppose everybody will admit that the power to open does not necessarily imply a power to count because it is not necessary to count in order to open and an implied power only arises when it is necessary that the so-called implied power should be exercised in order to the performance of the power that is given. The power that is given by the words of the Constitution is the power to "open." Now, the power to count is not essential to the power to open. You can open without counting. If the language had been reversed and it had said that the President of the Senate should count these votes, the certificates being sent to him, of course the implication would have arisen that he must open the certificates because he could not count them until he did open them; but it happens that the language is exactly the other way: he shall open and then the counting shall take place, without stating by whom in terms. Those who contend that it is an implied power from the authority to open, must show in inevitable logic that the power to do the first thing being granted, it necessarily follows that the power to do the second thing is covered by implication; in short, the power to do one thing implies the power to do two. I have not been able to see that that was a very clearly logical proposition. Plainly it is not.

Then let us go back a step and come to where I think the fundamental question really lies. The President of the Senate is to "open all the certificates." It may be said, and it must be said, that he is not authorized to open anything that is not a certificate. The Constitution only commands him to open "certificates;" and so it is argued he must decide, therefore, which is a certificate and his decision must be binding because the Constitution has reposed in him the power to open certificates and nothing else. How long would that stand the test of examination? The same article in the Constitution says, that he is to open what the electors send to him. On that same line of argument you extend the right to decide right back to the elector. You say the elector then in this Constitution, by the very same argument, is to decide what is the certificate, or if you go forward where do you find yourself? You find the very next clause is that if there is a failure of anybody to get a majority of all the votes the House of Representatives shall elect. On the same argument you are bound to say, and you cannot avoid it, nobody can, that the House of Representatives is the sole and exclusive judge of when the contingency has occurred that entitles it to act; and if one of these candidates had received three fourths of the votes, and you, sir, under this claim of power in the Constitution, had decided that he had and that they were all valid votes and that he was the President, the House could retire into its own Hall, and on the very same language of the Constitution turn around and say "By the same authority we decide," on the same reasoning exactly, "that nobody has got a majority, and we will elect our President." Then if you would follow it a little further in the same line, it says that in case of a failure to elect the Vice-President shall be President, somebody comes immediately in and says, "I am the Vice-President; everybody admits that I am elected; I decide under this power of the Constitution that the contingency has occurred when I am to act as President; I say to the man that the President of the Senate has appointed or declared elected, 'Go your way; you are not President.' I say to the man that the House of Representatives has elected, somebody else, 'Depart.' The same Constitution that you live by also gives me the last chance at this, and I send you all away, and I am President, because I must determine whether the contingency has happened whether I am to act or not." And then you might come back the next day, Mr. President, to carry it clear through, and say that they were both disabled, unable to perform their duties, and you would act as President, and that is conclusive!

Sir, to borrow a phrase from my learned friend from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] "that won't do." [Laughter.] To do an act which the Constitution commands is one thing; to decide a dispute is an entirely different thing. Whatever the Constitution commands you are to do. Whatever the Constitution commands the Executive, he is to do. Whatever the Constitution authorizes to be decided, the judiciary or some other tribunal fixed by law or by the Constitution itself is to decide. Those are the only three ways in which government can express itself. So that whatever you are to do, whatever the claims at the other end of the Capitol may be that they have a right to do, whatever the Vice-President may say that he has a right to do under the Constitution when the President has not been elected, whatever you, the President of the Senate, have a right to do when both of them are unable to perform the duties of their office, there still remains behind it all in the very essence of government the necessity of having a power that binds you all at the same time to determine when and under what circumstances each of you shall bring your forces into play; and as the Constitution has not fixed that tribunal, it has declared that Congress shall pass every law which shall carry into execution every power that is vested anywhere in the Government.

The question may be asked, why did not the Constitution say so, then? It did not say so because after having defined the range of powers and their nature for every department of the Government, commanded what should be done, it left, as all constitutions in all civilized governments everywhere have done and must do forever, to the law-making power from time to time to carry all these great powers into effect by the regular measure of legislative procedure. I can scarcely state that so well—I am sure I cannot—as it is stated by the Supreme Court of the United States itself more than sixty years ago when, just as now and just as always in governments, there arise great disputes touching the powers of Government. This was a question of State rights, of the right of the Supreme Court of the United States to disregard and set aside the judgment of the supreme court of the great State of Virginia; and when arguments similar to those that I have been putting forward as what might be suggested against this bill and about the language of the Constitution were made, the court answered them in this way:

> The Constitution, unavoidably, deals in general language. It did not suit the purposes of the people, in framing this great charter of our liberties, to provide for minute specifications of its powers, or to declare the means by which those powers should be carried into execution—> or to declare the means by which those powers should be carried into execution. It was foreseen that this would be a perilous and difficult, if not impracticable task. The instrument was not intended to provide merely for the exigencies of a few years, but was to endure through a long lapse of ages, the events of which were locked up in the inscrutable purposes of Providence. It could not be foreseen what new changes and modifications of power might be indispensable to effectuate the general objects of the charter; and restrictions and specifications, which at the present might seem salutary, might, in the end, prove the overthrow of the system itself. Hence its powers are expressed in general terms, leaving to the Legislature, from time to time, to adopt its own means to effectuate legitimate objects, and to mold and model the exercise of its powers, as its own wisdom and the public interests should require.—Martin vs. Hunter's Lessee, 1 Wheaton, 326.

If there is any one principle of constitutional law that is settled as deep as the foundations of the Government itself, it is that which I have just read. There is scarcely one, in fact I only remember one provision of the Constitution of the United States that has been said to execute itself, and for which it was not necessary or proper that there should not be the provisions of legislation to carry it into effect and to regulate the methods and manners by which results should be arrived at. I believe it was said in the case of Prigg vs. The Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, on the subject of fugitive slaves, that as the Constitution recognized a slave as property and as the fugitive clause in the Constitution gave the master the right to his property if it should have escaped from him, that clause in the Constitution did execute itself so far as the right of the master was concerned to recapture his property anywhere he could find it, if he could do so without violence and without a breach of the peace. That was put upon the ground that it was simply a recognition of the right of property, just as at the common law, as under the laws of most of the States, no doubt, a man would be entitled, if he could do it without violence or a breach of the peace, to recapture his children or his wife who were illegally detained from him. But beyond that I say I know of no instance in this wide variety of powers, legislative, executive, and judicial, anywhere, where there is not the fit necessity for legislative action to regulate and carry on the great objects of the exertion of the powers that are not by implication but expressly vested in some one of the departments of the Government; and even in that case to which I have alluded, where the court said that the Constitution did execute itself, they nevertheless held that that also was the proper subject of legislative action of Congress and that Congress might regulate, as it had regulated, the manner in which and the means by which the owner of the slave should assert his right to his property. The President of the United States, by the express language of the Constitution, is the Commander-in-Chief of the armies and navies of the Republic; and yet from the beginning until now, without question by anybody as to the constitutional propriety of such legislation, the manner in which and the means by which he shall exercise the power of Commander-in-Chief of the Army has been regulated by law. The Constitution of the United States vests judicial powers in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as Congress from time to time may establish; and yet one of the very first acts that the Congress under this Constitution ever passed was an act that regulated and guided and controlled from top to bottom the exercise of those powers that were clearly and expressly delegated to the judicial branch; and no man ever suspected that Congress was exceeding its power in providing by law for the means and the ways of the performance of the great judicial functions—those which, least of all, it would be safe for a republic should be unduly meddled with.

So, Mr. President, it does appear to us, without my enlarging upon this branch of the discussion, and for the very few reasons that I have so feebly stated, that the idea that this bill can be assailed as an unconstitutional measure, even if you say that the Constitution has vested the power of performing the executive or ministerial function of counting the votes which the Constitution says the person having the greatest number of shall be President, is not at all maintainable. You have only done in this bill what in respect to every other branch of the Government, and for all time, year by year, you have been daily doing with the acceptance of everybody. It only provides for ascertaining in a regular and lawful way what is the subject upon which this executive function of counting the vote, finding out who has the highest number, rests. It might be contended with considerable force, even if the duty, as far as I have heard it claimed for you, Mr. President, rested in that chair, that we have only furnished you the means of justly performing that duty; and that would be true, unless it should be contended that the Constitution had reposed in you the functions of Congress and of the judiciary to hear, try, and determine all questions of law and fact once for all, as in a given case whether you should be President of the United States or not. If the pretension goes as far as that, of course this bill is against it. But if it only goes to the point that you are to exercise a commanded ministerial duty of counting a vote, then upon the principles that I have stated it would be entirely competent, and the absolute duty of Congress, to provide you a means of finding out what is the vote that you are to count, and compelling you, as it does courts, presidents, everybody, to follow the judgment of whatever tribunal should have ascertained that fact for you, because it is only an act which you are to do, not a decision that you are to render.

But, as I have said, I only intended on this occasion to explain in as brief a way as I could exactly what the bill is and in a general way the grounds upon which it rests. The illustrations that might be still further made to show that this deciding power of which I am speaking does not rest with you, and as I think to show equally that it does not rest with either House of Congress until Congress provides a law that allows it to rest there, are so numerous that the whole day might be spent upon them.

There is one other topic which I will only just allude to at this present time, which of course bears upon it, and that is, what is called the contemporaneous construction of the Constitution in such cases. It has been said by many persons, and it appears to be largely believed, if you can take the statements of newspapers, that for a great many years the occupant of your chair has, with the acquiescence of everybody, so construed the Constitution; and so it is implied that that must be the true construction of the Constitution in the present case, because for so many years or until a few years back, fifteen or twenty or whatever the time may be, it had always been done. If that were true, it would be entitled to weight in the consideration of this question, perhaps to great weight; but a material inquiry, as it is with all cases of precedent, is to know whether it is true to begin with.

Now I deny emphatically that that is the history of the practice under the Constitution; and when I say that I do not mean to say that the President of the Senate has not counted the votes in the arithmetical sense, although I suppose as a matter of fact that from the time of John Langdon to Schuyler Colfax the President of the Senate never counted one of them. I will take it for granted that as a matter of law he did do the enumeration, although I suppose as a matter of truth in every instance the tellers who sat at the Clerk's desk did all the counting. What did take place for the first forty years of the Republic? There never was an instance in which a paper coming from a State under its great seal and certified by its governor as to who had been elected electors, or the certificate of the electors themselves as to how they had voted, was ever drawn into question; and the thing that the President of the Senate had to deal with was exactly the sort of thing that you had to deal with when yesterday you laid before us, under the great seal of the State of Maine, the credentials of a Senator, a public act of that great State in a condition of peace and order, with only one government or pretended government, with only one seal, and with the universal acquiescence of all parties, although it is full of parties. The reign of law had produced a result and there was nothing for you to decide, if you had the power of decision; all that you had was to do; for the act of 1866 says that the governor of the State shall certify to the President of the Senate who has been elected. Suppose you were to assume on such a set of papers as that that you had the right to decide whether that was the certificate of the governor—and the Constitution says pretty much the same thing in this case—would you ever think of doing such a thing? I rather think not.

But that is a little off what I was saying about the precedents. On the first occasion when, in the language of the suggestion of the constitutional convention in order to put the Government into force, the electors were recommended to send their certificates, not to the President of the Senate as the Constitution in explicit terms says, but to the Secretary of the United States, and that the Senate, not yet having a Vice-President, not yet having a constitutional President, for the Constitution says that the Vice-President shall be the President of the Senate and it is only in his absence that a President pro tempore is to be appointed, a President of the Senate should be appointed for the sole purpose of opening and counting, as the words are, the electoral votes. What did it mean? Is there anybody who hears me who believes that that constitutional convention by those words intended to command the President of the Senate elected for the sole purpose of counting to enter into or have a right to enter into an inquiry as to what States had ratified the Constitution, which inquiry should bind anybody? Suppose the Senate differed with Mr. John Langdon, suppose he had said when the papers all came in "There is one from Rhode Island," that had not yet ratified the Constitution, as we know historically; suppose there was a vote from Rhode Island for somebody and Mr. Langdon had undertaken to say, "Certainly, I take the vote of Rhode Island, she is in the Union," do you suppose there was a single Senator present who, as the saying is, would have submitted to it for a moment? The Constitution said that the votes should be counted. The constitutional convention asked the Senate, as it did, to appoint him for the purpose of counting the votes. It did not appoint him for the purpose of judging votes. If it had, it would have said so. That was the first instance.

But if you are to give the language its broadest possible interpretation, fill it with all the hopes and wishes of the five millions of people who wish as I do, what would you find? You would find that on that very day each House of Congress by a resolution of its own provided for the manner in which he should pronounce that result, and commanded him in what form he should make it known to the persons whom they said he should send information to that they had been elected, and he obeyed the command. If he had this independent power that is talked about vested in him by the Constitution as being the supreme judge only in the presence of indifferent witnesses who have no more right to interfere than a witness in court has with the proceeding of the judge, would they have done that? I do not think that the idea ever entered their heads. And as you sweep along down through the course of time of cases when there was no contest or dispute, but the merely formal reading and counting of papers, it is of very little consequence to inquire whether the President of the Senate read and counted them, or whether the tellers read and counted them, or whether nobody read and counted them, so that you got at what everybody knew beforehand was the result. But whenever and on the first occasion that any question arose as to what was the constitutional vote of a State, either arising from ineligibility or other question about its electors or from the condition of the State itself, (which is exactly the same thing, for there the question is, is it the vote of a State, and that involves not only the eligibility of the elector, the day of the meeting, or the existence of the State, or the pursuit of the State law—it involves one as much as the other,) you find that the President of the Senate never hinted on the face of the earth that he had such a power, and that each House in the absence of legislation assumed—I think there is great doubt about the correctness of their assumption—but they did assume, either by the expression of their judgment or by the dictates of their command, to determine what should be done.

So, then, Mr. President, it cannot be maintained that this bill is unconstitutional upon the ground that it takes away from the President of the Senate or the House of Representatives a power which the Constitution has vested in them free from limit, and free from guide, and free from regulation, to be exercised according to their own opinion of what may be the public propriety of the occasion.

Having said so much, Mr. President, for the present I dismiss the subject, in the hope that the Senate will carefully consider whether it is wise, by stimulating doubts in their own minds, or by allowing their wishes to outrun their judgment, to send this Republic on the first Thursday in February, or the second Wednesday in that month, like the mountains that the poet has spoken of that were

> Toppling evermore
> Into seas without a shore, or whether it is better that in the fair course of equal law a dispute shall be justly settled.

Mr. WRIGHT. I move that the Senate now adjourn.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask the Senator to withdraw that motion, if he will, and let me move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. WRIGHT. Very well.

Mr. CONKLING. I make that motion.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After fifteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were re-opened, and (at two o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, January 20, 1877.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

J. M. MICOW.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, of Alabama, by unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 109) for the relief of the estate of J. M. Micow, of the State of Alabama, was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

REVISION OF THE LAWS.

Mr. DURHAM, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 3156) to perfect the revision of the statutes of the United States, with amendments by the Senate, and moved that the House non-concur in the Senate amendments and request a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DURHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the House non-concurred in the Senate amendments and requested a committee of conference; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RESUMPTION OF SPECIE PAYMENTS.

Mr. HENDEE, by unanimous consent, presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Vermont, asking for an early resumption of specie payments; which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HENDEE. I ask that, by unanimous consent, the joint resolution may be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection. The joint resolution is as follows:

A joint resolution for an early resumption of specie payments.

Whereas the act of Congress which made greenbacks a legal tender in place of coin was cheerfully submitted to as a measure of necessity, to preserve the national life:

And whereas eleven years have elapsed since the close of the war, which have been years of extravagance and great indebtedness, both public and private, promoted in a large measure by our irredeemable paper currency: Therefore,

Resolved by the senate and house of representatives, That the present time, when business is depressed, while the values of all kinds of commodities are low and large amounts of currency are lying idle, while the balance of trade is in our favor and large amounts of gold are flowing into our country from foreign countries, presents a favorable opportunity for the adoption of measures leading to the resumption of specie payments. That we respectfully instruct our Senators and request our Representatives in Congress to use all honorable means to procure the enactment of such laws at the next session, as, by a gradual reduction of the currency, a gradual accumulation of gold in the United States Treasury and in the national banks, and a strict economy in the administration of public affairs, will make practicable a sure, easy, and permanent resumption of specie payments by the 1st day of January, 1879.

Resolved, That his excellency the governor be requested to transmit to each of the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this State a copy of the foregoing preamble and resolution.

REDFIELD PROCTOR,
President of the Senate.
JOHN W. STEWART,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

STATE OF VERMONT,
Office of Secretary of State:

I, George Nichols, secretary of state of the State of Vermont, hereby certify that the foregoing is a true copy of a joint resolution adopted by the General Assembly, at its biennial session, A. D. 1876.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the seal of this office, at Montpelier, this 28th day of November, A. D. 1876.

[SEAL.] GEORGE NICHOLS,
Secretary of State.

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT—WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. LANE, by unanimous consent, presented a petition of Lucinda F. Proebstel, Sara J. Riggs, E. P. Henderson, and others—204 men and 280 women—citizens of the State of Oregon, asking for a sixteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States prohibiting the several States from disfranchising United States citizens on account of sex; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. WAIT. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw from the files of the Committee of Claims the papers in the case of Edward H. Wilson, for reference to the Court of Claims.

The SPEAKER. Has an adverse report been made in that case?

Mr. WAIT. There has been no adverse report.

The SPEAKER. Then, if there be no objection, leave will be granted for the withdrawal of the papers, copies being left.

No objection was made, and the leave was granted.

DESTITUTE POOR OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. SINGLETON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4473) for the relief of the destitute poor of the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

DARIUS B. RANDALL.

Mr. FENN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4474) for the payment of Darius B. Randall for certain improvements relinquished by him to the United States for the use of the Nez Percé Indians; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. WILLIS. On behalf of the Committee on Naval Affairs, I ask leave to withdraw from the files of the committee the memorial of Rear-Admiral R. N. Stembel, United States Navy.

No objection was made, and the leave was granted.

REMOVAL OF POLITICAL DISABILITIES.

Mr. HARTRIDGE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4475) removing the political disabilities of Joel S. Kennard, of Savannah, Georgia; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. HARTRIDGE. I will state that the bill is accompanied by the usual petition.

Mr. HURLBUT. I ask for the reading of the petition.

The Clerk read the petition, as follows:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

The petition of Joel S. Kennard, of Savannah, Georgia, respectfully shows that he was an officer in the Navy of the United States; that on the 22d day of April, in the year 1861, he resigned his commission in said Navy, and entered into the service of the late Confederate States, whereby he incurred the political disabilities prescribed by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which disabilities he prays may be removed by your honorable bodies; and your petitioner will ever pray, &c.

J. S. KENNARD.

SAVANNAH, GEORGIA, January 15, 1877.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

STENOGRAPHER FOR THE UNITED STATES COURTS FOR CALIFORNIA.

Mr. McCRARY, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported, as a substitute for the bill (H. R. No. 4236) to provide for the appointment of an official short-hand reporter for the United States courts in and for the district of California, a bill (H. R. No. 4476) to provide for the appointment of an official short-hand reporter for the United States courts in and for the district of California; which was read a first and second time. The bill reported as a substitute was read, as follows:

A bill to provide for the appointment of an official short hand reporter for the United States courts in and for the district of California.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the circuit justice of the ninth judicial circuit of the United States in and for the district of California shall have authority to appoint a short hand reporter for the circuit court of said district, whose duty it shall be, under the direction of the court, to take in short-hand writing full notes of the oral testimony and other proceedings upon trials of issues of fact in said court, in any case in which both parties request it; and he shall file such notes with the clerk of the court. And such reports, when written out in long-hand, shall be deemed to be prima facie a correct record of any proofs or proceedings so taken, after being authenticated by the certificate of said reporter.

SEC. 2. That the official reporter of the circuit court in and for the district of California shall be, ex officio, the short-hand reporter of the district court of said district. But should his services be required in both courts at the same time or should it be necessary for the dispatch of business, he may, with the consent of the circuit and district judges, employ an assistant to aid him in the discharge of his duties.

SEC. 3. That the official reporter so appointed shall be skilled in the practice of his art, shall be an officer of the court, and hold office during good behavior and so long as he efficiently discharges the duties of his office. Before entering upon his official duties he shall take and subscribe the oath prescribed by section 1750 of the Revised Statutes of the United States and also an oath to faithfully perform the duties of his office, which oath shall be filed as required by section 1759 of the Revised Statutes.

SEC. 4. That the same fees which are now allowed by law to reporters of the district courts of said State in San Francisco shall be paid to the reporter appointed by this act, and shall be paid by the parties and be chargeable in like manner.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is not too late, I believe, to make the point of order upon that bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the point of order comes too late.

Mr. HOLMAN. Well after this I call for the regular order.

Mr. McCRARY. Allow me to say to the gentleman from Indiana for his information especially, that the bill provides for the employment of a reporter only in cases where both parties request it, and the fees are to be paid by the parties, and not by the Government.

Mr. HOLMAN. There is no objection to that.

Mr. LUTTRELL. This bill meets the approval of those interested in legal proceedings on the Pacific coast.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. McCRARY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. COCHRANE. I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COCHRANE. I desire to make a correction of the RECORD of Thursday last. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] asked unanimous consent to take up and consider the bill H. R. No. 1016, which bill was reported by myself as a member of the Committee of Claims. It was discovered that the bill which was reported by the committee, and which contained the amendment "Strike out the words, 'with interest thereon from the 12th day of May, 1865,'" was not at the Clerk's desk, some one having substituted a bill without such amendment. Now, it appears from the RECORD that the Speaker made the following statement:

The Chair does not doubt that the amendment was intended to be reported, but in some manner it has been omitted, and the Chair will therefore submit the amendment to the House.

In point of fact the amendment was reported, but the bill reported by the committee was mislaid or lost.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to say that his statement at the time was correct. Subsequently the actual bill which the committee reported was found, and the amendment found accompanying it; and the bill was engrossed from that bill subsequently found, and not from the bill read to the House.

Mr. COCHRANE. I did not desire the RECORD to show that there had been any neglect on the part of the committee, for there was no such neglect.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is further informed by the Clerk that the matter appears on the Journal correctly.

GREAT AND LITTLE OSAGE INDIANS.

Mr. GOODIN by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4477) to amend an act entitled "An act to confirm to the Great and Little Osage Indians a reservation in the Indian Territory," approved June 15, 1872; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

DENNIS M'CARTY.

Mr. GOODIN also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4478) granting arrears of pension to Dennis McCarty, late a private Company D, First Regiment Virginia Volunteers, in the Mexican war; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

ARCTIC DISCOVERIES.

Mr. LYNDE, by unanimous consent, presented the following preamble and resolutions; which were read and referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Milwaukee, January 13, 1877.

Whereas this chamber has been and is now interested in matters of scientific interest, and has by its action largely aided and forwarded the inception and perfecting of the present Signal Service of the United States, as applied to commerce and navigation;

And whereas this chamber is desirous of expressing its interest in and good will toward all measures calculated to forward and extend scientific explorations and experiments which may have even an indirect bearing upon such subject: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That we cordially approve of the proposed appropriation of $50,000 by the General Government to aid in the establishment of a temporary colony, for the purpose of exploration and scientific research, at or near the eighty-first degree of north latitude, under the direction of the President of the United States and with the advice and counsel of the National Academy of Science, to carry into effect such detailed observations in the sciences of meteorology, botany, geology, and climatology, together with the perfecting of the geography of unknown regions extending to the north pole, as may increase the sum of human knowledge, redound to the credit of the United States, and sustain the reputation and honor of our country already won through the labors of De Haven, Kane, Hays, Hall, and other eminent explorers in the northern polar seas.

Resolved, That the secretary be instructed to transmit to our Senators and Representatives in Congress a copy of the foregoing preamble and resolutions, and to respectfully request their careful consideration of the same.

The foregoing preamble and resolutions were introduced at a meeting of the Chamber of Commerce of Milwaukee, January 13, 1877, and unanimously adopted.

N. VANKIRK, President.
[SEAL.] W. J. LANGSON, Secretary.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. GRANT, his Private Secretary.

JAMES C. SWASICK.

Mr. COWAN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4479) granting a pension to James C. Swasick, of Ohio; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the report of the select committee on the rights, duties, and privileges of the House in counting the electoral vote, and the resolutions which were reported from that committee by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KNOTT.]

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. I move that the rules be suspended and that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the Indian appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would rule that the unfinished business is first in order. The Chair, however, would entertain a motion to lay aside the unfinished business, and, should that motion prevail, then the motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WELLS] would be in order even before the morning hour.

Mr. KASSON. I would ask the gentleman if he is not willing to let us have a morning hour, and then to make his motion immediately after the close of the morning hour? We have not had a morning hour for several days, and if we can have one at this time the House might be able to dispose of some committee business.

Mr. KNOTT. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. WILLIS,] I believe, is entitled to the floor on the regular order.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does the Chair hold that a motion go into Committee of the Whole on an appropriation bill is now in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair holds that the unfinished business first comes up after the reading of the Journal; but it is competent, if any gentleman can secure the floor with the consent of the gentleman entitled to the floor on the unfinished business, to move to lay the regular order of business aside. And then the motion to go into Committee of the Whole on an appropriation bill will be in order even before the morning hour.

Mr. WILLIS. I have not yielded the floor for any motion to be made.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I would raise the question of the further consideration of this proposition at this time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would entertain that motion, if the gentleman can obtain the floor for that purpose, for it ought to be within the power of the majority of the House to regulate its business.

Mr. KNOTT. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. WILLIS] is entitled to the floor, can he be taken from it for the purpose of entertaining such a motion?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed—and if he is misinformed of course he will be corrected—that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] did not use all his hour, but yielded twenty minutes of it to his colleague, [Mr. HURLBUT,] who waived the use of it at the time. The present occupant of the chair was not in the chair at that time.

Mr. HURLBUT. The facts of the case are these: My colleague [Mr. BURCHARD] yielded to me the remainder of his time. I did not desire to use it then, but preferred that some gentleman on the other side should first speak, as I proposed to antagonize these resolutions. I therefore yielded the floor in order that the gentleman from New York [Mr. WILLIS] might take it.

The SPEAKER. Then the Chair would think the gentleman from New York entitled to the remaining time of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. WILLIS. I speak in my own right and am entitled to my full hour.

Mr. HURLBUT. The understanding was that whatever time I chose to use might be used at a later stage of the debate.

The SPEAKER. Then, in other words, by unanimous consent, an arrangement was made that the twenty minutes of the gentleman from Illinois, instead of being immediately used, should be used at the end of the time of the gentleman from New York. The Chair will rule, however, that, while the gentleman will be entitled to his time, it will be competent afterward for the House to determine whether it will proceed with the unfinished business.

Mr. WILLIS. May I inquire of the Speaker whether by this arrangement I am deprived of forty minutes of my time?

Mr. O'BRIEN. The understanding the other evening was that twenty minutes belonging to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] were given to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HURLBUT,] who waived his right entirely.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand that he waived it entirely.

Mr. O'BRIEN. He waived it entirely: he gave up his right; and the gentleman from New York took the floor in his own right and is entitled to an hour. That was the understanding.

Mr. PAGE. Is it not in order now to call for the morning hour, and let this discussion come up after the morning hour?

Mr. O'BRIEN. The gentleman from Illinois did not claim his time; he gave it up entirely, as I understand.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. Does the Chair refuse to entertain the motion to postpone the special order for the purpose of going into Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. On the contrary, the Chair is trying to reach some way by which amicably that motion can be entertained. The Chair believes that a majority of the House has the power to regulate its own business and the manner of its proceedings.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. If the gentleman from New York insists on proceeding, the motion to postpone would not be a privileged one until he yields the floor.

The SPEAKER. That is what the Chair thinks.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I think the Chair is correct.

Mr. HALE. Then we can get at the question at the end of the hour.

Mr. WILLIS. I wish to inquire before I proceed whether I am confined to twenty minutes or whether I have a full hour?

The SPEAKER. In view of the statement made by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. O'BRIEN,] the Chair would rule that the gentleman has his hour.

Mr. HOLMAN. At the end of the hour of the gentleman from New York the question of further consideration, as I understand, can be raised.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has so ruled, and would hold that the question of consideration could be raised now but for the fact that the gentleman from New York is on the floor and does not yield for that purpose.

COUNTING THE ELECTORAL VOTE.

The House resumed, as the unfinished business, the consideration of the following report of the committee to ascertain and report what are the privileges, powers, and duties of the House of Representatives in counting the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States:

Resolved, First. That the Constitution of the United States does not confer upon the President of the Senate the power to examine and ascertain the votes to be counted as the electoral votes for President and Vice-President of the United States.

Second. That the only power which the Constitution of the United States confers upon the President of the Senate in respect to the electoral votes for President and Vice-President of the United States is to receive the sealed lists transmitted to him by the several electoral colleges, to keep the same safely, and to open all the certificates or those purporting to be such in the presence of the Senate and the House of Representatives.

Third. That the Constitution of the United States does confer upon the Senate and the House of Representatives the power to examine and ascertain the votes to be counted as the electoral votes.

Fourth. That in the execution of their power in respect to the counting of the electoral vote the House of Representatives is at least equal with the Senate.

Fifth. That in the counting of the electoral votes, no vote can be counted against the judgment and determination of the House of Representatives.

Sixth. That the committee have leave to sit again and report hereafter further matter for the consideration of the House.

The pending question was upon the adoption of the following substitute, submitted by Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois, on behalf of the minority of the committee:

Resolved, First. That it is the power and duty of the House, conjointly with the Senate, to provide by law or other constitutional method a mode for fairly and truly ascertaining and properly counting the electoral vote for each State so as to give effect to the choice of each State in the election of President and Vice-President.

Resolved, Second. That in the absence of legislative provision on the subject or authoritative direction from the Senate and House of Representatives, the President of the Senate, upon opening the certificates, declares and counts the electoral votes for President and Vice-President of the United States.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, we have but recently emerged from a contest in which forty millions of intelligent, self-reliant people engaged with honest zeal, in obedience to the forms and requirements of law, to determine who for the four ensuing years should be Chief Magistrate of the Republic.

The Constitution contemplates, the spirit of our institutions requires that such determination shall be the free, unhampered choice of the people, expressed by a majority of electors.

We have universal suffrage. No man is denied the elective franchise. No man is exempt from the responsibility which its exercise imposes. How imposing and sublime! A mighty people, respecting conscience and manhood, participating in choice of rulers. This spectacle mankind have witnessed all through our history, first with distrust, then with envy, and finally with an admiration so intense that in our centennial year all the nations vied with each other in yielding us unqualified praise and homage. I know not the man who was base enough to breathe the thought that the last election would be exceptional in our experience; that when the election was concluded the result would not be acknowledged, business resumed, and partisan hates and prejudices buried as heretofore; for no one believed a Cæsar or a Napoleon breathed our free air. No one supposed that even Grantism could have Mexicanized freemen. No one supposed a people who had proclaimed their independence in 1776, and afterward extorted it from a monarchy, then the most formidable on earth; who in a later struggle had vindicated their right to independence by compelling the respect of the same power; who, yet more recently still, in a supreme struggle for national life had overmastered a rebellion more fierce, more resolute than was ever before confronted, surely have not in the brief period of eight years become so poisoned and infected by bad government as to unlearn all their past, forget all their traditions, all the wise maxims and blessed memories which, like brilliants of the Orient, glitter in almost every chapter of our history.

TILDEN'S ELECTION CONCEDED.

The morning after election day almost every newspaper in the land contained the intelligence that Samuel J. Tilden was the President-elect of the United States. Democratic editorials abounded with exultant expressions of joy, hope, and thanksgiving. Republican editorials were crowded with philosophic reflections counseling acquiescence and submission. All, save basest partisans, indulged in a sigh of relief that the ordeal was over. American securities became buoyant and advanced in value. Confidence sprang into life. Joy and prosperity were, seemingly, just ahead.

A CONSPIRACY.

But, gentlemen, when unprincipled party leaders recovered from the shock of their defeat they conjured up a fiend in their hearts. Audacious assertions that Tilden had been defeated were made and persisted in. Though the people disbelieved, apprehension and distrust came and with them a period of gloom and depression which veils us in the black darkness of night. The people seized the meaning of these reckless assertions. They knew by sad experience that the authors of them were men wholly wanting in scruples, wholly strangers to honor. They knew instinctively that a conspiracy was determined upon involving the overthrow of popular government by the inauguration of a defeated candidate as President. They know it to-day, and ere long those plotters will realize the existence of a power before which their conspiracy will break away as do unstable dams when overridden by a flood—a people terribly in earnest to avenge their wrongs.

They who but a few weeks before declared that the South was a solid unit for Tilden and Hendricks now vociferously proclaim that South Carolina, Florida, and Louisiana have voted for Hayes.

Why South Carolina, Florida, and Louisiana? Palpably because they cast just enough votes to give Hayes and Wheeler a majority of one in the electoral college.

Does any man, knowing the conspirators, familiar with their methods and their desperation, doubt that, had it been necessary for their purpose, they would have insisted just as emphatically that North Carolina or Mississippi, or both, had voted the same way?

But those two States were sufficient for the end in view; they abounded in apt agencies, in men who could escape righteous retribution only by a continuance of this administration in power. Election laws were in force there, enacted for the express purpose of perpetuating their authority. Returning boards were there whose crimes, already exposed and denounced by honest men of all parties, by the voice of honorable committees appointed by both Houses of Congress, were such as to give assurance to their masters that they were equal to any infamy; even to that infamy which towers above all others, as does the giant peak above the surrounding earth: the murder of American liberty. They had a Chief Magistrate already practiced in assaults upon the rights of his countrymen, who had already caused every honest cheek to blush with shame and every honest heart to throb with madness by the use of bayonet and cannon in suppressing the voice of the people. Could not the men who had perpetrated the foul crime against Louisiana in 1874 perpetrate anew the same crime in 1876? So they, instigators of this conspiracy, believed, and so they trusted not vainly.

Armies were hurriedly forwarded to the States in question, with orders to sustain the criminal returning boards and uphold the tottering wretches who misgovern and oppress their peoples; sent sometimes on a plea of suppressing domestic violence, as in Louisiana, where no violence occurred; sometimes, as in Florida, without any pretext whatever, where no justification is even claimed; sometimes, as in South Carolina, for the pretended reason that the National Government had been called upon to secure to the people a republican form of government. Where no outbreak had occurred, the Army has—shame—a shame human lips cannot express—upon its officers—overthrown republican government by stamping upon the mandates of its highest courts.

O, how American manhood is debased, how American soldiership is sullied by the example of a Ruger! Unhappy Republic, when the defenders of its people become their oppressors! This is no novel experience. Strange these soldiers have such poor memories! After Sheridan had by his cold-blooded, heartless crime against the people of Louisiana oppressed the people with sadness and shame, provoking a feeling of wrathful resentment in the heart of every honest man, democrat or republican, the President in his annual message denounced the wrong and declared its commission to be without his authority.

He evidently had learned a lesson from Cæsar Borgia, who, after conquering Romagna, appointed Ramiro d'Orco as governor and gave him limitless authority. He oppressed the people by his baseness and cruelty; when Cæsar Borgia, who had instigated all, intent only upon his schemes, with a view of escaping the reproaches which were justly his due, caused Ramiro to be massacred in the market-place, before the eyes of all the people.

Our President did not massacre Sheridan, nor even cashier him, but he did not hesitate to do that which to a soldier of honor should be deemed a punishment more disgraceful than death. He made him the scorn of his countrymen.

In Ruger he found another Ramiro, and soon poor Ruger will be abandoned and disowned; at least so soon as the purposes of the Executive or of his party can be subserved thereby.

The President then, to resume the narrative, issued an order, in language which justly inspired the whole people with pride and confidence, insisting that a fair count should be had and called upon certain gentlemen to proceed to New Orleans and elsewhere, and supervise the action of the returning board.

The President assumed the boards were dishonest, or wherefore have them watched? Why shoot arrows at the stars?

Then, indeed, very many believed that the President, a man who had carved through hostile legions a pathway to victory; whose brow had been laureled with glory by a grateful people; who had been honored, even as he who was first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen, by a re-election as Chief Magistrate, would in the hour of supreme peril have a proper consciousness of duty, and once more place his countrymen under an obligation which would cause him to be glorified in remembrance by after-generations. They dared, in a moment when hope was in the ascendant, to be oblivious of his political offenses and to think that he might agreeably disappoint the country by asserting an honorable manhood as he did so unexpectedly before when he vetoed what was known as the inflation bill. By satisfying a hope so just the President could have climbed upon the heights of Olympus. He chose rather to descend.

The committee then sent to those States, as I have remarked, refused to confer with political opponents who were there in the interest of justice; they encouraged the returning boards in their work of infamy; they gave the plotters to understand that the military arms of the Government was behind them and would sustain them in any crime they might commit against a bleeding and oppressed people; they entered into conclave with conspirators, and so well assured were they of the result already agreed upon that weeks before any adjudication upon the returns was had, and when they showed prima facie an acknowledged majority for Tilden electors, telegraphed over the North that a given number of parishes would be thrown out sufficient to secure the electoral votes of those States for Hayes. What I have said everybody knows to be true; every step taken by this election board, either through the Administration or its agents, gives indubitable proof of a conspiracy to overthrow popular government.

NO SUBMISSION TO WRONG.

Now, let it be understood, when I say the American people will never submit to the overthrow of self-government by conspirators.

There lives not an honest, patriotic citizen, democrat or republican, but would, if he could, suffer death a hundred times rather than behold the wreck of liberty, wrought by a scoundrelly returning board, upheld and spurred on by unworthy rulers. Such a conspiracy under the auspices of a Cæsar or a Napoleon might be borne, but submission to a conspiracy under the auspices of a returning board composed of scalawags and Federal officers would imply a moral degradation disgraceful even in a South American republic. Anglo-Saxon manhood will never fall to such a depth in the world's scorn and contempt.

This conspiracy has exposed the nation to a peril mightier than any it has ever encountered. It has aiders and abettors in every branch of the Government. Foreign war means expenditure of blood and treasure and the glory and shame consequent upon victory or defeat. Rebellion meant a Union saved or a divided Republic; in either case liberty would not perish. To-day we are staggered by an unhallowed attempt to blight and destroy, utterly and forever, the divine right of the people to govern themselves. How to avert this peril, how to rescue this people from a destiny the contemplation of which curdles the blood and palsies the lips is the fearful problem to be solved, wisely, if at all, by the sworn Representatives, not of a party, but of a people.

THE DUTY OF CONGRESS.

If we fall not far short of our obligations, the toils will be speedily broken; the chains forged by conspirators will melt in the hot wrath of the people; it is our especial province to right every wrong, to pursue every fraud, until a just result is reached and self-government made triumphant. Some gentlemen seem to doubt our power, and to regard with nonchalance the fraudulent manipulation of canvassers and returning boards, because they are State officers, subject only to State laws, beyond the reach of Federal interference or Federal authority. Such a shallow pretense cannot stand alone or be supported for an instant! It only occurs to them as a convenience, as a dodge. It is belied by their own acts!

Why did Federal troops proceed to the State of South Carolina and there, under the direction of an unprincipled and insignificant man by the name of Dennis, interfere with the organization of a State Legislature and give moral support to Chamberlain and his confederates?

Why was a Federal judge dispatched there to spit upon the mandates of the highest State court and to give impunity to the men who were in contempt for a disregard of its orders?

Why were troops hurried to Florida to overawe democrats and encourage fraud? Why were United States bayonets and cannon put at the service of unconscionable partisans; and why were they sheltered by United States authority?

Why were partisans commissioned to go to Louisiana and elsewhere, on the plea of securing an honest count and in consummating a conspiracy?

Why all these things? I inquire if those counts were State matters, with which the people had nothing to do?

This reasoning was not employed until villainy had done its worst, until the popular result in three States had been reversed by Federal interference, Federal intimidation, and Federal support. Now you want to profit by the fraud, it becomes necessary to abandon old tactics. You say a wrong done by the Federal Government, the Federal Government cannot undo.

To the winds with such false logic. You may urge the troops were sent to secure a republican form of Government. If no republican form of government existed in these States, assuredly they could not participate in that sovereign duty which implies a free exercise of choice on the part of electors, the election of President and Vice-President of the United States, and it follows their votes cannot be counted. If republican government was not overthrown, the Army had no business there, the rights of the people were invaded and trampled upon without possible justification.

In any case, the result of the elections in those States would not have been reversed but for the interposition of Federal authority. What has been done by Federal authority will be undone by Federal authority.

The President is a mere agent of the people; the Constitution and laws made pursuant thereto are together the letter of his authority.

What he has done in the South is outside of the Constitution, is in defiance of the Constitution, and must be disowned and made of no effect by us. The product of this unconstitutional interference is, the people of the United States have had their will nullified and their sovereignty usurped. Some justify the conduct of the Executive by the assumption that those States are naturally republican.

THE FREEDMEN.

Distinguished party leaders have asserted that they will never permit the electoral vote of a State where negroes are in a majority to be counted for Tilden and Hendricks. The same men who assert this to-day before the election endeavored to rekindle the furious hates of a struggle ten years ago well ended, by the cry of a solid South.

Gentlemen, this will not do. Ten years of misrule and oppression have brought starvation and sorrow to the freedmen!

Wherever republican rule has obtained, chaos still presides—social order and security are unknown.

Wherever virtue and intelligence have dominated over carpet-bag rule, business has revived and peace reigns.

The colored men have been robbed of their earnings by fraudulent savings-banks; they have been stuffed with lying promises; they have been deceived until deception no longer availeth.

The negroes are intelligent beings. Why wonder, then, that they are undeceived? Why wonder that they prefer peace rather than tumult; plenty rather than want; honest democrats rather than dishonest republicans; their old friends and masters rather than adventurers, who have proved to them devouring vultures.

Gentlemen, no man in this country detested slavery more than I; no man welcomed the proclamation of emancipation more than I; and therefore do I, for humanity's sake, protest against the attempt to bind the black man with chains more galling than those which, by God's providence, were snapped asunder in war.

The colored men understand all this; they are turning away with a sense of loathsomeness from their deceivers, and when the arm of Federal power is withheld, under the auspices of a benigner rule, they will overthrow the last vestige of carpet-bag rule on this continent.

Mr. Speaker, let us brush aside these questions, which are incidental, but not vital, which bear upon the equities, but not the law of the case.

LOUISIANA.

As to Florida and South Carolina, though their electoral votes in fairness should, I believe, be counted for Tilden, I confess myself not sufficiently familiar with the facts to intelligently present a proper course of conduct for us to pursue toward those States.

But as to Louisiana, there an issue is fairly presented. Tilden and Hendricks electors had a certain honest majority of over 8,000. A returning board has arbitrarily set aside that majority and given certificates to Hayes and Wheeler electors. Was such action legal? If not legal what is the remedy and how to be applied?

Mr. Speaker, assuming that the returning board is possessed of powers sovereign and unappealable, as is claimed by the visiting committee and also by gentlemen in this House; that it can, at will, reverse majorities, set popular opinion at defiance, and actually determine the choice of President and Vice-President, I think that no one will have the hardihood to dispute that the exercise of such terrible powers should be confined within strictly defined limits; the law granting it this authority should be strictly construed. One step outside the law and this acts are ultra vires, inconsequential and void.

ILLEGAL CONSTITUTION OF THE RETURNING BOARD.

I maintain that the returning board is illegally constituted; the essence of the law is that it should be unpartisan; the letter of the law requires it should consist of members belonging to both political parties. This is a needful presumption. In every State where there is an approach to fairness, election officers are unpartisan; generally speaking, they are equally divided between the parties.

Section 2, law No. 98, 1872, provides:

That five persons to be elected by the senate from all political parties shall be the returning officers for all elections in the State—and further—in case of any vacancy, such vacancy shall be filled by the residue of the board of returning officers.

The board is unanimously republican. Though there was a vacancy, yet the remainder of the board disregarded the law and violated their oaths by refusing to fill the vacancy and select a democrat.

There is no principle of law which can be invoked to legalize this board. Its constitution is wholly unlawful and defeats the very purpose of the act: a fair canvass and compilation. It of necessity precludes all fairness, and in consequence all of its acts are illegal, and we are bound out of respect to the people of that State to disregard them altogether.

In New York the law provides that inspectors be appointed from both political parties. Imagine that provision disregarded and all the inspectors appointed democrats. Would their acts command obedience or respect? Would they be in any sense binding? No, sir; and furthermore the people of New York would not for an instant tolerate such a gross and unwarrantable subversion of their rights.

This election law, construed by legal rules and maxims, means an unpartisan scrutiny and compilation of returns; construed by gentlemen on the other side, it means that it is a republican machine, made to order to keep that party eternally in power.

I insist that laws in Louisiana must be construed by the same maxims as laws elsewhere, subject to the same presumptions; and in that view the Louisiana returning board is an illegal body, whose judgment should command no respect and whose findings are simply atrocious.

ILLEGAL ACTION OF RETURNING BOARD.

But further, Mr. Speaker, supposing the law had been complied with touching the requirement that it should comprise members of both political parties, let us ascertain whether any validity can attach to its declarations reversing a popular majority in favor of Tilden electors exceeding eight thousand votes. It claims under section 3 of the act of 1872 that it has the right to reject and exclude votes from the compilation of returns, when—

After examination, provided the said returning officers shall be convinced that said riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences did materially interfere with the purity and freedom of the election at such poll or voting place, or did prevent a sufficient number of the qualified electors thereat from registering and voting to materially change the result of the election, then the said returning officers shall not canvass or compile the statement of the votes of such poll or voting-place, but shall exclude it from their returns: Provided, That any person interested in said election by reason of being a candidate for office shall be allowed a hearing before said returning officers upon making application within the time allowed for the forwarding of the returns of said election.

But preliminarily it is declared, in the same statute, that such action can be had only in hac verba, we say—

Whenever from any poll or voting place there shall be received a statement of any supervisor of registration or commissioner of election, in form as required by section 26 of this act, an affidavit of three or more citizens, of any riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences, which prevented or tended to prevent a fair, free, and peaceable vote, not otherwise.

Now, sir, here is a prerogative given to five men to review, and, under certain circumstances, reverse, the result of a popular election; a prerogative which has never been exercised in a government professedly democratic, outside of the South under military rule, except under Napoleon III, when he concluded to overthrow the French republic and seize the reins of absolute power. Every fair-minded man will concur with me that when such a power is exercised it should be in literal and rigid compliance with the letter of the statute and with every condition therein expressed. I charge here, an examination of the case as presented by the visiting committee, in the interest of the returning board, will bear out the charge, that no foundation was in any case laid which gave legal justification for throwing out the vote of any one parish. Here is what the statute says upon the subject:

SEC. 26. Be it further enacted, &c., That in any parish, precinct, ward, city, or town in which, during the time of registration or revision of registration, or on any day of election, there shall be any riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, and disturbance, bribery or corrupt influences at any place within said parish, or at or near any poll or voting-place or place of registration, or revision of registration, which riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, and disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences shall prevent, or tend to prevent, a fair, free, peaceable, and full vote of all the qualified electors of said parish, precinct, ward, city, or town, it shall be the duty of the commissioners of election, if such riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, and disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences occur on the day of election, or of the supervision of registration of the parish, if they occur during the time of registration or revision of registration, to make in duplicate and under oath a clear and full statement of all the facts relating thereto, and of the effect produced by such riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, and disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences in preventing a fair, free, peaceable, and full registration or election, and of the number of qualified electors deterred by such riots, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, and disturbance, bribery or corrupt influences from registering or voting, which statement shall also be corroborated under oath by three respectable citizens, qualified electors of the parish. When such statement is made by a commissioner of election or a supervisor of registration, he shall forward it in duplicate to the supervisor of registration of the parish, if in the city of New Orleans, to the secretary of state, one copy of which, if made to the supervisor of registration, shall be forwarded by him to the returning officers provided for in section 2 of this act, when he makes the returns of election in his parish. His copy of said statement shall be so annexed to his returns of elections by paste, wax, or some adhesive substance, that the same can be kept together, and the other copy the supervisor of registration shall deliver to the clerk of the court of his parish for the use of the district attorney.

SEC. 43. Be it further enacted, &c., That immediately upon the close of the polls on the day of election the commissioners of the election at each poll or voting-place shall proceed to count the votes as provided in section 13 of this act, and after they shall have so counted the votes and made a list of the names of all the persons voted for, and the offices for which they were voted for, and the number of votes received by each, the number of ballots contained in the box, and the number rejected, and the reasons therefor, duplicates of such lists shall be made out, signed, and sworn to by the commissioners of election of each poll, and such duplicate lists shall be delivered, one to the supervisor of registration of the parish, and one to the clerk of the district court of the parish, and in the parish of Orleans to the secretary of state, by one or all of said commissioners in person, within twenty-four hours after the closing of the polls.

It shall be the duty of the supervisors of registration, within twenty-four hours after the receipt of all the returns for the different polling-places, to consolidate such returns to be certified as correct by the clerk of the district court, and forward the consolidated returns with the originals received by him to the returning officers provided for in section 2 of this act, the said report and returns to be inclosed in an envelope of strong paper or cloth, securely sealed, and forwarded by mail. He shall forward a copy of any statement as to violence or disturbance, bribery or corruption, or other offenses specified in section 26 of this act, if any there be, together with all memoranda and tally-lists used in making the count and statement of the votes.

I challenge, sir, any gentleman on the other side to point out a solitary case where the law was complied with by the returning board as provided by sections 26 and 43. I challenge any reference to the case, as presented by the supporters of Mr. Hayes, which will show compliance. You say, while condemning by implication the law and the conduct of the returning board thereunder, this is a legal result: it is an unappealable judgment. You insist upon the law, the letter of the law. Well, you shall have it, but you will find it gall-wood. We cannot impugn you as you do proceed; proceed, therefore, until you are as fond of law as Shylock was when, in his despair, he exclaimed, "Give me the bare principal and let me go."

This is the same returning board precisely which had an engagement and performed in 1874; and here is what the honorable committee, among whom was the distinguished member from Maine [Mr. FRYE] who eulogized with ecstatic phrase as the paragon of every human excellence J. Madison Wells, said in relation to their conduct in a case precisely similar, in their report made February 23, 1875:

> We are constrained to declare that the action of the returning board, on the whole, was arbitrary, unjust, and in our opinion illegal.

Also:

> Upon this statute we are all clearly of opinion that the returning board has no right to do anything except to canvass and compile the returns which were lawfully made to them by local officers, except in cases where they were accompanied by the certificates of the supervisor or commissioner provided in the third section. In such cases the last sentence of that section shows that it was expected that they would ordinarily exercise the grave and delicate duty of investigating charges of riot, tumult, bribery, or corruption on a hearing of the parties interested in the office. It never could have been meant that this board, of its own motion, sitting in New Orleans, at a distance from the place of voting, and without notice, could decide the right of persons claiming to be elected.
> There is no more dangerous form of self-delusion than that which induces men in high places of public trust to violate law, to redress or prevent what they deem public wrongs.

In all of which I heartily concur.

I appeal now to those honorable witnesses to abate naught in their zeal for fair play; to frankly repeat to their deluded followers "that they are constrained to declare the action of the returning board was arbitrary, unjust, and in their opinion illegal." Yield your party fealty "to your love of truth and your reverence for the sacred right of the people to govern themselves." The country will then forget and forgive the eulogy on J. Madison Wells, and my honorable friend from Maine can console himself with the reflection that, after all, the president of the returning board was not born in the pine woods of his native State.

REQUIREMENTS OF THE LAW.

Now, sir, the law is explicit; it requires by the terms of section 25 that the statement should constitute a part of the return itself, containing all the facts upon which the charge is predicated and the effect of the violence or intimidation charged; the protests and statements must be attached by wax, paste, or other adhesive substance; and section 43 of the same statute requires such protests and statements to be sent in with returns within twenty-four hours after their reception by the supervisor of registration. These provisions are certainly plain enough. All the election machinery was in the hands of the republicans, republican supervisors and assistant supervisors of election, republican constables in charge of the boxes.

As a rule all the sheriffs, judges, and district attorneys were republicans, and the commissioners of election were appointees of the supervisors. The law gave these officials power to make summary arrests; to disarm all electors; to close places where intoxicating liquors were sold; it required complaints to be forwarded by the registration officers from time to time, if any intimidation was resorted to which interfered with the registration, to be completed by terms of the statute ten days before the election; and if the story of Kellogg and his allies is to be believed, in all the parishes in controversy the republicans vastly outnumbered the democrats, and there, too, was the United States Army, which bull-dozers never ventured to resist, ready to aid when called upon in the enforcement of the election laws. Therefore there is no room for excuses and pretexts that the laws could not be enforced.

If statements were not forwarded pursuant to law, the sole responsibility is upon republican officials, who had ample power, and certainly were not wanting in disposition. And yet there has not been, there was not made, a single complaint that registration was interfered with or that violence occurred at any poll, in the manner prescribed by law. No statements were made in duplicate or otherwise, and attached by wax, paste, or other adhesive material, to the election returns as provided by law, and consequently, under the law, there were no returns which the returning board had a right to investigate or go behind.

No gentleman who has examined the statute will controvert this, that the intent of the law was that the statements as to intimidation or interference either with registration or election should be made out contemporaneously with the returns; that the supervisor and commissioners of election should act without concert or consultation, so that the officers of one voting-precinct would at the time be ignorant of what had occurred in any other voting-precinct. It required all statements to be made up and forwarded before the result in the State could be known or even conjectured. And yet not in a single instance were complaints made out at the time and in the manner specified in the law, and therefore the returning board never possessed the jurisdiction claimed to reject the returns of any parish; they violated their oaths when they did so. They could truthfully confess themselves, as Medea did:

> Our lips are sworn, but our minds are unsworn.

They wholly ignored both the letter and the intent of the law; they permitted the returns to remain in the hands of supervisors up to the very hour of the count still open and unsealed, to be filled with affidavits yet unwritten; they kept matters in abeyance until the precise majority of Tilden and Hendricks electors, to wit, 8,957, was known.

Then the returning board and their advisors, whose bitter and relentless partisanship was never disguised, counseled together, surveyed the field, and ascertained precisely what was required to be done, how many voters would have to be disfranchised that the Hayes and Wheeler electors might be counted in. They gravely contemplated the mode by which the mischief was to be wrought. They knew the extent to which the Chief Magistrate could be relied upon. They were schooled in precisely the same villainies they found it now necessary to practice and repeat. They boldly set to work. How they did the work, and with what result, although well known, I am about to relate.

As they began, disregarding the law, so they continued unto the end. Their chief work they did in secret. True, they invited committees from the North of five each, representing both parties, to attend their meeting; but whenever a point was considered involving the disfranchisement of a parish, they at once went into executive session, and there four republicans, so called, whose souls were reeking with partisan hate and selfishness, devilishly contrived to cheat the people of Louisiana, and so adjudicate upon the returns as to annihilate an honest majority of over 8,000 for Tilden, and give to Hayes a pretended majority of more than 4,000.

And upon what proof? None whatever but by rejecting votes upon ex parte affidavits, drawn up generally in New Orleans by office-holders, which ignorant negroes were induced to sign with a cross. Of course these persons could not read the affidavits, and the language was certainly not their own, and very generally such as they could not understand. The candidates interested had no fair opportunity to be heard; cross-examination was rarely allowed. None of the methods for the investigation of truth which have been found necessary by experience and have the sanction of immemorial usage were employed.

The all-sufficient, self-righteous judges of the returning board could dispense with these appliances. They assumed the right to shape the destiny of a Republic, to settle a question involving the rights of forty millions of people, on ex parte affidavits, full of opinions and conjectures, without any legal force or effect, signed generally with crosses, by parties ignorant of their contents; for there is no proof to the effect that they were even read to the affiants. What mockery of justice! And yet the decrees of this court are proclaimed by republican statesmen as infallible!

Fortunate judges, who rejoice in such eulogies, bestowed upon them while living, and that, too, by men who in 1874, after due reflection, characterized action entirely similar, as "arbitrary, unjust, and, in their opinion, illegal." Two years of Grantism has enlightened their understanding and heightened their moral perception!

Verily, the people were right when they declared by a popular majority, which even the frauds of South Carolina, Florida, and Louisiana have not extinguished, that Tilden and reform had become a necessity which could no longer be deferred without danger to the Republic.

Mr. Speaker, it happened, also, that supervisors of election withheld returns, and the returning board declined sending for them; and why? Because no moneys had been appropriated for such purpose; it was determined to put the confederate House of Representatives to the blush by zeal for retrenchment; the cost required was seventy-five cents. Wonderful economy! Gentlemen, we are surpassed! But in such cases it invariably happened that the returns showed a heavy democratic majority! How sublime, such economy! How disinterested such virtue! And yet, my distinguished friend from Maine omitted to mention all this in his remarkable eulogy on the character of J. Madison Wells.

I have succeeded, gentlemen, in establishing beyond the reach of controversy these propositions:

First. That the returning board is illegally constituted in that all its members belong to the republican party, contrary to section 2, act of 1872.

Second. That, waiving the illegal constitution of the board, it had no right to reject the votes of any parish or to examine into the legality of the votes of any parish, unless a statement had been made by supervisor or commissioner of election and attached to the election return and forwarded within twenty-four hours after their reception, supported by testimony of three witnesses, to the effect that intimidation and violence had been resorted to to such an extent as to materially affect the result of the election.

Third. That the returning board illegally assumed jurisdiction of the disputed parishes without warrant of law, proceeded upon illegal and unauthorized protests, based on fabricated ex parte affidavits, refused interested candidates a fair hearing, and in so doing committed a crime without parallel in its bold infamy.

Admitting all contained in the affidavits, permitting every allegation affecting the integrity of the democratic party in the State of Louisiana to stand, these propositions remain uncontroverted, and gentlemen on the other side have neither the ingenuity nor the audacity to gainsay or deny them. All we ask is that the judgment of a republican House of Representatives, solemnly pronounced after due investigation and reflection, be entered anew. The democratic party accepts it as their judgment and deems the matter res adjudicata.

CONDITION OF LOUISIANA AND THE CAUSES.

In parts of Louisiana society is in a deplorable condition. Republican rule in that State has well-nigh brought upon the people the blight of death. Oppression and extravagance have yielded a harvest of crime. Lawless bands roam throughout her borders. White men and black men have yielded to the contagion. Murders are frequent, but I refuse to believe they have a political significance. If so, why were the proofs withheld before elections when it was known of all men that the Administration yearned for a pretext upon which troops might be sent to that State and interfere.

All reputable citizens there desired peace, and they recognized the fact that their only safety consisted in a peaceable election, while the only hope of Kellogg and Packard depended upon riot, murder, and confusion.

Probably restraints were sometimes imposed upon voters; they are in every State more or less; but the election law of 1872 provided a penalty. If such penalties were not enforced the criminality belongs to republican officials and is due to a neglect on their part of sworn duties. Restraints, however, have, as the proof stands, been more frequently imposed upon democrats than upon republicans.

All the crimes, all the disorders, all the woes which afflict Louisiana proceed from a vicious government, conducted by adventurers and thieves, sustained by ignorance. The only remedy is a change of rulers, to the end that the virtue, intelligence, and manhood of the State can come to the fore-front and control the government as in Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, and Arkansas, where the people are rejoicing in social security and a revival of business prosperity.

Let me present briefly a purely legal reason why the action of the returning board should be set aside and declared null and void.

FACTS CONFERRING JURISDICTION UPON RETURNING BOARD CANNOT BE PRESUMED, AND MUST BE AFFIRMATIVELY SHOWN.

This returning board is not a court of general or original jurisdiction; it is not even a court; but a commission of special, limited jurisdiction; no facts giving it jurisdiction, can be presumed. The maxim "Omnia præsumuntur rite esse acta" does not apply. As is said by Judge Holroyd in Rex vs. All Saints, 1 Mass. & Ryl, 688:

> All the facts which show the jurisdiction must be stated, and they must also be proved.

In a court of general jurisdiction, power and authority shall be intended, but inferior or limited courts are bound affirmatively to show jurisdiction. So, too, in summary proceedings, and more especially in proceedings before a commission authorized to act in special matters, where certain requirements have to be complied with, and then only in a certain mode, as in the case of the Louisiana returning board; which requirements and mode are distinctly and specifically set forth in the statute, whereby the returning board was itself created.

This doctrine prevails, and this rule is enforced in all civilized countries, as uniform decisions, made from time to time through the centuries, clearly attest.

To dispel all doubt upon the question as to whether the action of the returning board is null and void, I will state this proposition, the terms of which are such as to cover precisely the subject-matter of controversy:

> In all cases in the courts, and especially in courts of inferior jurisdiction, where the authority to proceed is conferred by statute and where the manner of obtaining jurisdiction is provided by the statute, the mode of proceeding is mandatory and must be strictly complied with or the proceeding will be utterly void.

This proposition is lucidly discussed and laid down with emphasis in numerous cases found in Potter's Dwarris on Statutes, page 224, edition of 1871; Corwin vs. Merritt, 3 Barbour, 341; Harrington vs. The People, 6 Barbour, 607; The People vs. Common Council of Brooklyn, 22 Barbour, 405; Bloom vs. Burdick, 1 Hill, 130; People vs. Schermerhorn, 19 Barbour, 541; and many others of like import.

The returning board did not possess general jurisdiction, even over the subject of elections; its functions were prescribed specially and limited by the terms of act No. 98, 1872, bound up with laws of 1873, page 15. It was bound to count and compile all votes found in the returns, as provided by section 2 of the act of 1872, save as provided in sections 3, 26, and 43.

In view, then, of the legal proposition stated, sustained uniformly by authorities, it will require some audacity in endeavoring to justify the action of the returning board in rejecting votes honestly cast sufficient in number to convert a Tilden majority of more than 8,000 into a Hayes majority of more than 4,000.

FORMER TREATMENT OF RETURNING BOARD BY CONGRESS.

This unspeakable infamy will never be indorsed by an American Congress. It is unfair to assume that the Senate, any more than the House, will disregard in this respect the voice of the people, not of of Louisiana alone but of the whole country. In 1873 the perjured certificate of Kellogg, certifying a list of presidential electors, was indignantly disregarded and ignored. In 1874 and 1875 his fraudulent senatorial certificates were contemptuously spurned. Why should not a certificate stained with perjury and fraud yet more devilish not meet the same fate in 1877?

I am not among those who believe that the sworn representatives of the people, for the selfish purpose of inaugurating a member of a certain party as President, will in a crisis like the present, while the safety of the nation is jeopardized, cancel their declarations and their votes, made and given when partisan feeling was absent and their judgment disinterested.

I have supreme faith in the House, in the Senate, in the people, most of all in the people, who, if all else fails, will, let what will betide, see to it that the President of their choice is inaugurated on the 5th of March.

POWER OF CONGRESS TO COUNT AND DETERMINE VALIDITY OF ELECTORAL VOTES.

As to the question on whom devolves the duty of counting the electoral vote and correcting wrong, fraud, or illegality, I apprehend there are few who are perplexed with doubt or uncertainty. The Constitution is fully adequate and sufficiently explicit for the purpose of settling it satisfactorily. The clause governing this duty is in these words, found in section 1 of article 2 in the Constitution:

> The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted.

The specific duty of the President of the Senate is defined, "he shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates." Nothing beyond. Even the exercise of this power is subject to congressional inspection, supervision, and direction.

Mark the language, "in the presence of the Senate and House," not of the members of both Houses, but clearly both Houses, must meet together and be present at the opening of the certificates, with all their officers, complete in organization, with clerks, sergeant-at-arms, and all appurtenances necessary, ready to act severally in legislative capacities. Both Houses must appear and be present, not the members of both Houses. The direction amounts to an absolute mandate. The President of the Senate has no right to open the certificates unless in such presence.

"And the votes shall then be counted." How and by whom? As Congress shall enact or direct.

POWER OF CONGRESS TO LEGISLATE.

There will not be found on this floor or elsewhere anybody possessed of honesty and intelligence who will seriously dispute the right or the power of Congress to prescribe the mode whereby the President of the Senate shall perform his duty in the premises, or the manner in which the vote shall be counted and declared, subject to constitutional provisions. Were not such right and power inherent in and a necessary incident of the provision in question, all dispute would be absolutely disposed of by the last clause of section 8, article 1, of the Constitution, that Congress shall have power "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper in carrying into execution the foregoing powers and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof."

That there remains an open question regarding this electoral count, is not a fault to be imputed to the Constitution or to the unwisdom of its authors. It is due wholly to the failure of the National Legislature to act. The advocates of all theories coincide in the judgment that this power to legislate on this subject exists. Every bill offered affecting this duty or power recognizes the right; the rules of interpretation are unheeded, the constitutional text is unequivocal and ample. Every joint resolution touching this question, either introduced or passed, affirms the existence of the power.

The proposition that Congress has express power to legislate is out of the domain of discussion.

If this proposition be true, it follows logically and necessarily that its exercise is dependent on the concurrent action of the two Houses in their distinctive, separate capacities.

If Congress has the right to constitute an agency to count the vote, it certainly has the right, the original right and power as the source of all authority, to exercise it within itself, and in the absence of legislative provision, the power resides nowhere else save in Congress.

As Chief-Justice Marshall declared in Cohens vs. Virginia, 6 Wheaton, 418:

> The safest rule of interpretation will be found to look into the nature and objects of the particular powers, duties, and rights with all the lights and aids of contemporaneous history, and give to the words of each just such operation and force, consistent with their legitimate meaning, as may fairly secure and attain the ends proposed.

This power is expressed in clear phrase. The object was that each State in itself should, in such manner as the Legislature thereof might direct, choose presidential electors in number equal to the number of Senators and Representatives.

The duty of ascertaining whether electors have been chosen pursuant to the State laws and the national Constitution is in Congress. There is no other department of Government, there is no other functionary, endowed with such power. That the States have a right to choose electors as their Legislatures direct, subject to constitutional restrictions, is a proposition universally accepted. But who is to determine whether the State laws have been obeyed? Who is to determine whether the will of the people has been regarded? Where there are two sets of electors who is to determine which set is valid?

If the postmasters or other officials holding positions of profit and trust under the United States contrary to the constitutional provision have been furnished with certificates certifying to their choice as electors, who is to enforce the prohibition and pronounce their election null and void?

If questions arise as to whether in certain cases vacancies have occurred or whether vacancies have been filled, who is to adjudicate? Congress, and Congress alone; and how: by concurrent action; not in joint convention, but by separate bodies, organized and acting in distinctive capacities.

POWER OF CONGRESS TO COUNT ESTABLISHED BY CUSTOM.

If there was in the Constitution a casus omissus, as there is not, it would still follow that the duty and power of counting would belong to Congress; for the reason that custom and usage in every election since the foundation of the Constitution has invariably recognized such to be the law. Electoral votes have without exception been counted by the tellers of the two Houses save in the first election, when there was no contest. By unanimous consent and concurrent action on the part of both Houses, John Langdon was appointed President of the Senate for the sole purpose of opening certificates and counting the votes. This is not an adverse precedent. The power of the President of the Senate was born of the concurrent action of the two Houses. The rights of the two Houses have always been insisted upon, and whenever any of the questions affecting the legality of any votes have arisen, they have been discussed and decided respectively in and by both Houses; and where there has been want of concurrence, votes have been rejected and in no instance counted.

Though, as the honorable gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] remarked in his argument, Chancellor Kent did, in his Commentaries, declare:

> The Constitution does not expressly declare by whom the votes are to be counted and the result declared. In the case of questionable votes and a closely contested election this power may be all important, and I presume, in the absence of all legislative provision on the subject, the President of the Senate counts the votes and determines the result, and that the two Houses are present only as spectators, to witness the fairness and accuracy of the transaction, and to act only if no choice be made by the electors.

This mere supposition was subsequently nullified by the learned author himself, who in the same treatise distinctly holds that Congress has power to legislate upon the subject.

The same honorable member attached great consequence to the fact that this certificate, to wit:

> That * * * on the second Wednesday of February, A. D. 1801, the undersigned, Vice-President of the United States and President of the Senate, did, in the presence of the said Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and count all the votes of the electors for President. * * *
> In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and seal this 18th day of February, 1801.
> THOMAS JEFFERSON.

was signed respectively by Vice-President Adams and Vice-President Jefferson; but such certificates weigh nothing because directly contradicted by the Journals of both Houses, and can weigh nothing against the evident sense of two Houses as indicated by their uniform action.

The country now confronts a crisis the most momentous that has occurred since the birth of our Government. Partisanship is wrought to a pitch of fury. The wisest and most prudent of our citizens deem the occasion fraught with supreme peril. In the Senate, the republican party has a majority. In the House, the democratic party has a majority. If fealty to party is stronger than love for country revolution is nigh.

Now, where can be found the man, acting as a trustee for the people, in sworn service, who will assert the monstrous purpose to set aside precedent, to ignore contemporaneous exposition, to strike down land-marks, and resort to innovation? May the lips which utter such treason be blistered. The very earth such a man tramples on, he profanes.

Is a republic less tolerable than a monarchy? In England, without a written constitution, liberty is safe, because the people tolerate the invasion of no custom which has the sanction of age, of wisdom, and of experience. Even the Magna Charta is but a collection of maxims born of custom.

Now, sir, suppose the Constitution silent, the two Houses, by virtue of an unwritten law, which has been accepted and acted upon by all political parties, will exercise absolute control in determining upon the validity and legality of all votes; of ascertaining whether any are vitiated by fraud or for other cause, and finally in declaring who is the duly elected President of the United States, provided there shall have been a President elected, and, if not, then to proceed with the election in the mode which the Constitution has provided.

Mr. Speaker, that I may not be misapprehended, I insist that, aside from the rule which custom has sanctioned, aside from the interpretation contemporaneous with the Constitution, the express letter, the plain text of the Constitution invests Congress with the power to count votes and adjudicate upon their legality. But beyond the reasons already urged there is yet another, which, if any doubt or perplexity remained, would effectually determine the question.

IN EMERGENCY, HOUSE TO ELECT—HOUSE JUDGE OF THE EMERGENCY.

The Constitution declares, in the article which relates to the counting of votes, that in the event of no election in the college the House shall at once proceed to ballot for a President and the Senate for a Vice-President. Who is to be judge of the emergency or when it arises? Ex rei necessitate, as well as by every principle of known law, the House and the Senate; the agencies to act in the emergency, the House as to the President and the Senate as to the Vice-President; and for the stronger reason that the Constitution requires the emergency to be met at once, which implies an uninterrupted procedure from the beginning to the end of the count. Congress, by the very terms of this constitutional section, is absolute arbiter, under whose watchful eye the whole transaction of counting and determining is to be conducted; and then, if in its conduct the emergency in question arises, it shall forthwith remedy the failure to elect by balloting respectively for President and Vice-President.

Mr. Speaker, to argue this question further is vain business. It is indisputably the fact, and for all practical purposes conceded, that the function of the President of the Senate is confined to opening all the electoral certificates; that counting them devolves on Congress. Reaching this goal, the rest of the way is easy. What is the effect if the power is in Congress?

By reason of the premises already laid down, no positive thing can be done in the count without concurrent action to act. Each House must decide alike, and each House must decide that either the Tilden or Hayes electors have a majority of the votes cast in the electoral college, or no conclusion will be reached. Every thing done in and about the counting of the votes, the examination of certificates, the determining the legality of the votes, whether they are vitiated by fraud or not, are affirmative acts.

Where two bodies have discretion and power to do or not to do, a failure to concur defeats all action. Two judges having jurisdiction to decide, failing to agree, certify to the disagreement, and no judicial result is arrived at. So in this case, if the Houses disagree, no count takes place, and, as Henry Clay said in 1821, "If one House would say the votes ought to be counted and the other that they ought not, then the votes would be lost altogether." So the joint rule of 1865 provided; so have all proposed laws provided, including the law of 1800, which passed both Houses of Congress when many members of the convention which framed the Constitution were members of both Houses. So did Senator MORTON (in the Senate, March 24, 1876) declare, when a question as to the very case which now arises as to Louisiana was propounded by Senator WHYTE, in these words:

I think the precise contingency mentioned by the Senator from Maryland may happen by the vote of a State being lost, the two Houses not being able to decide, but that is the precise contingency which the Constitution has provided for when it declares that unless some one person shall have a majority of all the electors appointed the House shall immediately proceed to elect by States.

THE ESSENCE OF AN ELECTION THE TRUE EXPRESSION OF THE POPULAR WILL.

Mr. Speaker, more important than all other considerations is this: The essence of an election is that the people shall choose the President, that their voice, as expressed by a majority of electors lawfully chosen by the several States, shall be potential and conclusive.

Unhappy day for this Republic when technicality shall be permitted to thwart this great purpose; when the people's will shall be defeated by a quibble.

The consent of the governed is the soul of our Government; when that consent is disregarded, liberty is gone, the life of our institutions become extinct, the shadow and form of a republic alone remains.

Take the case of Oregon. Though Watts was ineligible and Cronin, in my judgment, according to strict law made an elector, shall his vote be counted? I would scorn myself as the basest of partisans, unworthy of my seat in this Hall, did I contend for such a doctrine.

The people are the real sovereigns. The people of Oregon in their sovereign capacity have declared their preference for Hayes and Wheeler, and they are entitled by the law of eternal justice to have that declaration made effective by having three votes cast in the electoral college for Hayes and Wheeler.

It has happened heretofore in this country that an elector by reason of sudden sickness was unable to attend the electoral college, and the vote was lost to the State. I refer to Kentucky in the sixth presidential election. Suppose the election depended upon the counting of that one vote, should it have been counted? Yes; its rejection would have defeated the sovereignty of the people and the intent of the Constitution.

In Wisconsin it occurred in 1856 that a furious snow-storm prevented the meeting of the electoral college on the day fixed by law. If the presidential contest had hinged upon the vote of that State, what fair-minded man was there who would not have been insulted by a proposition to reject such vote?

I might enumerate other cases, actual and hypothetical, where if form and technicality were alone to be regarded, all republicanism would be at an end on this continent.

And now, supposing fraud has been resorted to in the procuring of certificates in such wise that popular majorities have been reversed, is there no power here to undo the fraud and permit the people who suffered from it to have their great wrong redressed? He must indeed despise reason and hate justice with a bitter hate who will question this power or the right to exercise it by Congress.

In Oregon, in Louisiana, in any State where the popular will would be defeated, either by fraud or technicality if votes were counted, legally certified on their face, we have the power—it is our duty to go behind returns—to tear down all barriers which interpose between the people and their rightful choice.

Any plan, any joint resolution or statute proposed having in contemplation this just end, I will support with zeal and sincerity. But never will I assent to any proposition making the solution of the electoral controversy depend on chance, nor will I favor the submission of the question to a body outside of Congress. It would involve a delegation of power forbidden by the clear text of the Constitution. The labor is ours and we will perform it faithfully to the end.

THIS ARGUMENT BASED ON CONCEDED FACTS.

Mr. Speaker, the argument I have made is predicated on a statement of facts universally conceded; it has no reference to what has been developed before investigating committees in South Carolina, Florida, and Louisiana; it has no reference to the unauthorized and unconstitutional interference by the United States forces and United States judges, which would make it immeasurably stronger; it assumes all that has been stated by the supporters of Hayes and Wheeler as true; it deals with the record they have made up. And it shows logically and conclusively that the vote of Louisiana should be counted for Samuel J. Tilden; that the returning board, even waiving its illegal composition, acquired no jurisdiction to reject the votes of parishes which, if counted, would have defeated the Hayes electors by more than 8,000 votes; that either the Senate or the House have the power, in default of concurrence, to reject the votes of that State, or, if concurring, to count them for Tilden and Hendricks; that if the vote of Louisiana be rejected neither Tilden nor Hayes has a majority in the electoral college, in which event it is the constitutional duty of the House to proceed immediately to elect the President and the Senate the Vice-President. So far as relates to the Presidency, the popular will would be effective in either alternative.

Not now, as in 1800, when Jefferson and Burr received each a majority, to wit, 73 electoral votes, and John Adams 65, does there exist the possibility which Madison deplored, of a minority candidate being elected by the House. We are not threatened by what he termed a usurpation—a surreptitious intrusion; Tilden electors have a popular majority of more than a quarter of a million in the whole country, and the House of Representatives have a majority in harmony with the popular majority.

LET THE CONSPIRACY BE ABANDONED.

Gentlemen, dismiss all thought of further prosecuting a conspiracy against the people, forego your plans of insisting that the President of the Senate shall count the vote, or that a decision shall be delayed until after the 4th of March; abandon any project which will result in an interregnum, and meanwhile expose the country to the terrors of revolution and blast with ruin the industries of the land, by one grand sacrifice suffer your ambitions, your plans, your prejudices, your hates, to be lost in a devotion to country which is as much beyond party as is the religion of Christ beyond the creeds of the heathen.

Do not suppose you will profit by the conspiracy. Whether it fails or wins it will be the same to you. You will find all the comfort you are entitled to in the words Addison causes Sempronius to speak when urged to wrong:

> Know, villains, when such paltry slaves presume
> To mix in treason, if the plot succeeds
> They're thrown neglected by, but if it fails
> They're sure to die like dogs.

No trifling can be borne. Depart from precedents, trample on the Constitution, you defy the will of forty millions of freemen; you proclaim revolution.

Why, a crime of such tremendous magnitude as that contemplated has not been committed in the world's histoy. It might be tolerated were it of temporary consequence, but it involves the destruction of all confidence, all hope. If a party can prolong its authority for four years, why not for forty years? Why not for all time? If the people will submit to such an outrage this year, why will they not submit to it four years hence?

It is an idle supposition to expect a people who quietly permit their voice to be disregarded and their will overthrown will have the manhood and the patriotism to resist a usurpation after four years of acquiescence.

We are to-day standing face to face with a monster peril which must be met now if ever. The conspirators who threaten with rebellion our laws and liberties are criminals indescribably base; but infinitely more guilty will we be if by indifference, neglect, or cowardice we permit the success of the conspiracy. We shall have no excuse to urge. We have the power; what we need is the inclination to use it. The Constitution of our fathers is all-sufficient; wise precedents all along our history light our pathway.

Public opinion, burning with indignation at the commission of unequaled frauds, is urging us to be firm and constant. If we waver or betray, may Omnipotence crush with the thunderbolts of His wrath the walls of this Capitol, for they are hallowed by memories too sacred to survive such awful sacrilege!

May every wretch who shall by act of omission or commission contribute to the foul deed be buried beneath the wreck, that the world may know how Heaven is affronted by the guilt of perjury and treason! Again, I say, I do not recognize in the near future a resort to revolution, to violence, or to civil war.

There is not, there cannot be within the Chambers of this Capitol Senator or Representative who will forswear himself and stand accursed before men and angels by attempting to enthrone a usurpation.

In this solemn transaction oaths will be regarded, traditions respected, obedience to the forms and requirements of law insisted upon, and the full glory of our Republic attained by a result which will exemplify the excellence of our Constitution and the wisdom of our fathers.

The sovereign prerogative, the exalted duty of vindicating the right of the people to govern themselves, is ours. That prerogative, God helping us, we will assert; that duty we will piously perform. If we fail we will blacken our souls with cowardice, perjury, treason; we will permit and connive at the most unhallowed conspiracy ever planned against liberty and civilization. We will summon from the depths of hell the red demon war, and unchain his furies over this fair land.

But, Mr. Speaker, let us have a clear and accurate sense of what our duty is and resolutely determine to do it. All will then be well. We will cause the centennial year to surpass in glory all other years, for we will secure all through the coming ages a Government based upon the law of equal freedom. Despite the corruptions of our latter years, the reign of vice and profligacy which has poisoned as the blight of death; despite false notions of government, false sense of duty and responsibility engendered by war, there is a reserve force of virtue in this land; there is a moral consciousness in the minds of our people which will evoke from chaos a reign of peace, purity, and plenty. These are times

> That give mankind occasion to exert
> Their hidden strength and throw out into practice
> Virtues, which lie concealed
> In the smooth seasons and the calms of life.

Mr. SEELYE obtained the floor.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts to yield to me in order that I may move that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, so my colleague on the Committee of Way and Means [Mr.

WELLS] may proceed with the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill. This will facilitate business very much.

Mr. SEELYE. I have no desire to speak except for the sake of addressing the House, but I certainly could not ask their attention if they wish to give it to anything else. I am certainly willing to yield the floor for the House to decide upon the question of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] on condition that I retain the floor on this question when the discussion is resumed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts will be entitled to the floor whenever the unfinished business comes up again. It will be necessary to lay aside the unfinished business to keep it in direct line of discussion.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to present a question of order. I wish to call the attention of the House to what I understand to be the rule, although I may be mistaken. It is this: Rule 145 provides—

> No standing rule or order of the House shall be rescinded or changed without one day's notice being given of the motion therefor.
> By Rule 104 a majority may, at any time, suspend the rules for the purpose of going into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and also for closing debate therein; and by Rule 119 to make any of the general appropriation bills a special order. These are exceptions to this rule.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the rule contemplates in the case of an appropriation bill the importance of going into Committee of the Whole and the necessity of the Chair recognizing the right to make that motion. It contemplates, in my judgment, that it may be entertained by the Chair at any time. Indeed, the compiler of these rules puts the words "majority" and "may at any time" in italics, as indicating the force of those words that the majority may at any time suspend the rules and go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I make the point that under the rules it is in order at any time to move to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on an appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it competent for the House at any time to regulate the conduct of business, and whenever any gentleman can be recognized for that purpose, then it is in order to make the motion provided for in Rule 104.

Mr. HOLMAN. The Chair now recognizes the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. SEELYE?]

The SPEAKER. But the Chair thinks that a gentleman cannot be taken off the floor by any other member for the purpose of making the motion provided for in that rule.

Mr. HOLMAN. But if the gentleman voluntarily yields for that motion?

The SPEAKER. Undoubtedly he may do so.

Mr. SEELYE. I hope the gentleman from Indiana does not understand me as raising any objection to his proposition.

Mr. HOLMAN. No, sir.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. It is quite unnecessary to raise the question of order at present.

The SPEAKER. If the pending business be laid aside, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WELLS] to make the motion indicated.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. I rise to move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Before the question of order is left, I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Indiana to this statement on page 207 of the Digest:

> It is not in order to move a suspension of the rules while the House is acting under a suspension of the rules, unless connected with the business immediately before the House; nor while considering a special order, it having been made under a suspension of the rules, unless connected with the consideration of such special order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa is undoubtedly right in suggesting that the pending business should be laid aside before the gentleman from Missouri can make his motion. The Chair suggested the propriety of laying aside the unfinished business for the present.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I read the statement in the Digest in reply to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish it to be understood I do not yield the point I have made.

The SPEAKER. The Chair inclines to adhere to the judgment he gave an hour ago upon this point.

Mr. HOLMAN. The Chair holds then that when the House is proceeding under a suspension of the rules made on Monday, a motion to suspend the rules to go into Committee of the Whole could not be entertained.

The SPEAKER. The Chair believes this, that where the House is acting under a suspension of the rules it is not competent for the House to again suspend the rules; in other words, to duplicate the suspension of the rules.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is undoubtedly the rule as to the same motion; that is to say, a motion for the suspension of the rules by a two-thirds vote. But the very use of these words "may at any time" all through the rules as to going into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union with a view to consider appropriation bills, is undoubtedly for the purpose of meeting this case. If a motion is made on Monday to suspend the rules to consider a given business, certainly no other motion to suspend the rules is in order until that is disposed of. But perhaps on the same day, I think on the same day, a motion under Rule 104 may be entertained; for it only requires a majority vote to proceed to the consideration of business in Committee of the Whole. But if there is any difficulty on that point——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] must see what confusion it would create in the public business, if the House, while acting under a suspension of the rules, were to proceed to the consideration of other business. If it were to entertain another motion before the disposition of that business to again suspend the rules and go to something else, the business would get into inextricable difficulty.

Mr. HOLMAN. Allow me to suggest, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BRIGHT. I rise to a point of order. I submit that this debate is entirely out of order, there being no question before the House involving any necessity for it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to lay aside the present business that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WELLS] may make the motion he has indicated.

The SPEAKER. If that be agreed to the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SEELYE] when the unfinished business again comes up.

Mr. SEELYE. Will the Chair permit me to inquire when in regular order, provided the motion now pending before the House is assented to, this unfinished business would again come up?

The SPEAKER. Immediately after the disposition of the bill that the gentleman from Missouri now proposes to bring up. The business on which the gentleman from Massachusetts has been recognized continues right along as unfinished business.

Mr. SEELYE. Will it come up on Monday?

The SPEAKER. It will come up to-day after the Indian appropriation bill is disposed of, if that bill shall be disposed of to-day.

Mr. SEELYE. And if not to-day, will it come up on Monday?

The SPEAKER. On Tuesday.

Mr. SEELYE. It would pass over Monday?

Mr. HOAR. Allow me to inquire of the Chair if it would not come up on Monday after the morning hour, subject, however——

The SPEAKER. Subject to any one being taken off the floor by a motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. HOAR. Not subject to any one being taken off the floor by motion to suspend the rules provided the gentleman on the floor at the time, in other words, provided my colleague, [Mr. SEELYE,] after the call of the States on the expiration of the morning hour on Monday, should be recognized to proceed with his remarks. Then no motion to suspend the rules could be made while he holds the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that on Monday a motion to suspend the rules, which requires a two-thirds vote, has preference of even a motion to suspend the rules which only requires a majority to go into Committee of the Whole on an appropriation bill.

Mr. COX. Suppose the Chair should recognize the gentleman from Massachusetts, could any member then take him off the floor to make that motion to suspend the rules after the expiration of the morning hour on Monday?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Certainly not; because he is speaking under a suspension of the rules.

The SPEAKER. He is speaking already under a suspension of the rules, and that is the point the Chair stated a moment ago, that a motion to suspend the rules having prevailed and business having come before the House under that suspension, it is not open for any one to make a motion to suspend the rules again.

Mr. COX. The Chair is clearly right in that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would say that the easy way to dispose of the matter is for the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SEELYE] to take the assurance of the Chair that when this business is finished he will again be recognized.

Mr. SEELYE. I have no hesitation in taking that assurance. My only inquiry is as to when the matter will be likely to come up again, and whether its coming up on Monday would depend upon my taking the floor.

The SPEAKER. The impression of the Chair is that it would be interfered with on Monday, and that the gentleman had better conclude that it will come up on Tuesday.

Mr. HOAR. Is it not competent for the House now by unanimous consent to order that it shall come up on Monday after the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. The House can do anything by unanimous consent. The Chair, however, is inclined, upon first thought, to doubt whether the House on Saturday can by unanimous consent waive a proceeding on Monday, provided that proceeding shall be under a suspension of the rules.

Mr. HURLBUT. Is not this the case: if the motion prevails to postpone the pending matter, so long as the House is in Committee of the Whole, when the House goes out of Committee of the Whole the gentleman from Massachusetts will have the floor?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has so decided, and the question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Indiana that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. Pending that motion, I move that all general debate upon the Indian appropriation bill be limited to two hours.

The motion to limit debate was agreed to.

Mr. PAYNE. Before the House goes into Committee of the Whole, I desire to give notice that I shall move on Tuesday, immediately after the reading of the Journal, that the report of the joint committee on the counting of the electoral votes for President and Vice-President shall be made a special order for that day and Wednesday, with evening sessions.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to inform the gentleman from Ohio that he would be bound, notwithstanding this notice, to recognize the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SEELYE] on that day after the morning hour.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I desire the question to be taken upon the motion to go into Committee of the Whole, so that the House may have an opportunity to vote between going into Committee of the Whole or allowing the gentleman from Massachusetts to proceed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest to the gentleman that there is an immediate necessity for the passage of this bill now.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Before the House votes on the motion to go into Committee of the Whole, I desire to know how much time is to be allowed for general debate.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand that two hours are allowed for general debate.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. That is, debate on political questions?

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WELLS] can answer that question better than I can.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I want to make the point that it is not fair to take the gentleman from Massachusetts off the floor and go into Committee of the Whole and have general debate.

Mr. HOLMAN. I quite agree with the gentleman in that.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. There is a rule of the House upon the subject under which I shall raise a point of order the moment any gentleman attempts to speak upon questions not connected with the bill itself.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts will be permitted to proceed.

The SPEAKER. The sense of the House can be tested.

Mr. HOLMAN. Allow me to suggest to the gentleman from Iowa that I understand the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WELLS] is compelled, by order of the House, to allow a couple of hours for general debate upon this bill, and if those two hours are not occupied now it is quite clear that we cannot get through the bill as speedily as it ought to be done.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I do not see the necessity.

Mr. DURHAM. Is it in order to move an amendment to the motion to close debate so as to limit it to one hour?

The SPEAKER. The House has already decided to give two hours to general debate.

The question was taken on Mr. HOLMAN's motion; and on a division there were—ayes 60, noes 51.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, if gentlemen opposite do not wish to go on with the appropriation bills, let us have a record on the subject.

Mr. KASSON. We can reconsider the vote by which the motion to allow two hours for debate was agreed to.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. I trust not.

Mr. KASSON. That is the point of difficulty. We have no objection to going on with the appropriation bills, but if general debate is to go on, then certainly the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SEELYE] should be allowed to proceed.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman knows that there have to be two hours for general debate on the bill, and the question is whether that debate shall take place to-day so that we may proceed with the bill and pass it Tuesday.

Mr. KASSON. I do not know that any general debate is necessary on this appropriation bill, although I do know that it is necessary to pass the bill promptly.

Mr. HOLMAN. I should be perfectly willing to proceed with the immediate consideration of the bill itself.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. It has been customary always to allow some general debate on the appropriation bills.

Mr. SEELYE. May I be allowed to make the request that the gentleman from New York [Mr. TOWNSEND] will withdraw his call for the yeas and nays and let the vote stand as it has already been announced?

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. In compliance with the wish of the gentleman from Massachusetts, I withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

So the motion of Mr. HOLMAN was agreed to.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. HATCHER in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 4452) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1878, and for other purposes.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. I move to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Before the debate commences and while I do not know who is going to speak, I want to have the hundred and fourteenth rule, which controls the discussion of a special order in Committee of the Whole, read.

The Clerk read the rule, as follows:

114. In Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, the bills shall be taken up and disposed of in their order on the Calendar; but when objection is made to the consideration of a bill, a majority of the committee shall decide, without debate, whether it shall be taken up and disposed of, or laid aside: provided, that general appropriation bills, and, in time of war, bills for raising men or money, and bills concerning a treaty of peace, shall be preferred to all other bills, at the discretion of the committee; and when demanded by any member, the question shall first be put in regard to them; and all debate on special orders shall be confined strictly to the measure under consideration.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. I have no means of knowing what the gentleman desires to speak upon.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I do not know who is going to speak, but I will insist that the rules shall be observed. You took the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SEELYE] off the floor in order to go into Committee of the Whole upon an appropriation bill, and I will object to any political debate.

Mr. HOLMAN. It has already been decided by the House that there shall be two hours for general debate.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Yes, under the rule; and I have asked that the rule upon the subject be read.

Mr. WILSHIRE then proceeded to address the committee, but, after a few sentences, was interrupted by Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, who said: I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I did not know who was going to speak, and I am glad that I raised the question when I did. Personally I feel kindly toward the gentleman now on the floor, [Mr. WILSHIRE.] But we were told that it was necessary to go on with the consideration of the appropriation bills; the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] insisted that the public service demanded it. Yet it seems we are to have a speech similar to the one which we expected from the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. SEELYE,] who was taken from the floor. I ask the Chair to rule upon the point I have raised under the rule which I have required to be read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest that the practice has been so uniform heretofore, in regard to general debate on these appropriation bills, that the strict severity of the rule should not now be enforced. I trust that it will not be pressed by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] upon this bill; we are to have only two hours' debate.

Mr. COX. I raise the point that it is too late for the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] now to make his point upon the gentleman from Arkansas, [Mr. WILSHIRE.]

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Is it too late to make the point, as soon as I learn what the gentleman is to speak about? I did make the point before he spoke a word.

Mr. COX. Let me say that it is altogether probable that the gentleman from Arkansas will speak directly to the bill before he gets through.

Mr. WILSHIRE. I desire to say for the information of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] that it is quite probable that before I conclude I shall have something to say about Indian affairs.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The rule directs that debate upon a special order shall be confined strictly to the subject under consideration.

Mr. WILSHIRE. I do not understand that the rule puts in the mouth of any gentleman the words he shall employ in conveying his ideas to this committee.

Mr. KASSON. I think the practice heretofore has been that the Chair, on the reading of the rule, should state to the gentleman about to address the committee the fact that such a rule exists, and then it is left to the discretion of that gentleman to apply his remarks to the bill under consideration. I think that has been the practice heretofore, and I suggest to my colleague [Mr. WILSON] that it is not easy for the Chair to prescribe the form of speech.

The CHAIRMAN. The attention of the Chair having been called to the rule, the Chair is bound to enforce it, and to say to the gentleman from Arkansas that under the rule he must confine his remarks to the subject of the bill under consideration.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] will waive his point of order for the present, inasmuch as it has not been customary to enforce the rule strictly on these appropriation bills. I trust, however, the rule will be enforced hereafter, but I ask the gentleman to waive his point for the present.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I have considered this matter very carefully. I have no objection to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WILSHIRE] having his remarks printed in the RECORD, if he so desires. But in consideration of the way in which this matter has come up, the urgent request of my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] that the House should proceed immediately to the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill, and the further fact that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SEELYE] was taken from the floor for that purpose, I cannot see how, with any degree of consistency, I can refrain from insisting upon the strict application of the rule.

Mr. COX. How can the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] tell what will be the drift of the speech of my friend from Arkansas, [Mr. WILSHIRE?] He is now speaking as it were in limine upon the Presidential election. For all that we know he may comprehend all races and conditions of men in his consideration of that question. If his mind is as comprehensive as I think it is, he will wind up by including the red man. I hope that the gentleman from Arkansas, after the admonition of the Chair, will be allowed to proceed in order.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. The gentleman from Arkansas applied to me for a little time when this bill should come up, saying that he would soon be obliged to leave for his home in Arkansas on account of sickness in his family, and he was anxious to submit some remarks to the House. I trust that, under the circumstances, the gentleman from Iowa will withdraw his objection.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. If the gentleman from Arkansas wishes to submit his remarks at this time because he is obliged to leave for his home on account of sickness in his family, I will for the present withdraw my point of order. But I give notice that I will insist upon it and not waive it upon the next gentleman who undertakes to address the committee.

Mr. WILSHIRE then resumed and concluded his remarks, which were as follows:

Mr. Chairman, I am under great obligation to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WELLS] for this opportunity of presenting a few remarks on the state of the Union.

Sir, I had not thought at the beginning of this session of intruding any remarks of mine upon the attention of the members of this House. But the present situation of the country is such that it is the imperative duty of every Representative to contribute what he can to a peaceful solution.

In the determination of the grave questions presented by the various complications growing out of the late presidential election the defects of the national Constitution and laws are daily becoming more apparent and the peace and happiness of our people becoming more and more endangered.

These questions not only engage the serious attention of the people of the whole country, of all political parties, but involve the life of the Republic. Grave responsibilities now rest upon the representatives of the people in this Congress, responsibilities that I hope and believe are duly appreciated by all. If so, then some plan can and must be adopted by which these questions may be justly settled without impairing the great principles of our republican institutions.

The primary question, and one that seems to me to attract the most immediate attention, is, who were chosen President and Vice-President at the late election? The secondary question involved, and the one of greater magnitude than any that ever has arisen, or that ever can arise in this Government, is, shall we, in the settlement of the first, establish a precedent, not only inconsistent with, but one that must inevitably, sooner or later, sap the foundation of our republican system by consuming its most vital element, that of the "right of the people to rule?"

In my humble opinion a correct and just settlement of the question of which of the two candidates was elected must be upon the basis of religiously observing and preserving this great right. If we do so, then human rights and personal liberty are assured facts in this country; do otherwise, and the second century of the Republic will witness its downfall.

Sir, to understand my position correctly, I will go back to the foundation of free government and republican institutions, as I understand them. I am not one of those who believe in a higher-law doctrine, as understood in political circles a few years ago, but I do believe that there are rights of the people resting upon great fundamental principles of natural law, that rise in their majesty and power above constitutions and legislative enactments, or the action of the authorities under either, when those rights are assailed or attempted to be impaired. Among those rights is that of choosing those who are to exercise the powers they have delegated to their representatives or servants, without any restraint in elections, or hinderance by officers or returning boards. This right is the chief corner-stone upon which rests all there is of our boasted American liberty.

This doctrine was fully announced by the patriotic founders of the Republic in the Declaration of Independence, in which, among other things, it is declared that—

> All men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed.

It is to secure and protect those rights that written constitutions are made, not to defeat or in the least impair them. Indeed those rights are inherent in the people; they are incapable of being divested of them, either by their own consent or the will of others. As an inseperable incident to these natural rights is the well-recognized doctrine that the people are the source of power, and must be permitted to choose their public servants. This is manifest from the declaration that the just powers of government are derived "from the consent of the governed."

Nor, sir, am I one of those who would detract from the Constitution of the United States the least of that high veneration we have all been taught to entertain for it; but I may be permitted to say that it must not be regarded as the charter of our liberties or the origin of private rights. In support of this view of the Constitution, and the rights of the people which I regard as paramount to it, I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read an argument of the late Attorney-General, Mr. Bates, made as far back as 1851, long before the causes arose that have recently excited the passions of men in this country; which argument I find incorporated in the very admirable work of Judge Cooley on Constitutional Limitations.

The Clerk read as follows:

> What is a constitution, and what are its objects?
> It is easier to tell what it is not than what it is. It is not the beginning of a community, nor the origin of private rights; it is not the foundation of law, nor the incipient state of government; it is not the cause but the consequence of personal freedom; it grants no rights to the people, but is the creature of their power, the instrument of their convenience. Designed for their protection in the enjoyment of the rights and powers which they possessed before the constitution was made, it is but the frame-work of the political government, and necessarily based upon the pre-existing laws, rights, habits, and modes of thought. There is nothing primitive in it; it is all derived from a known source. It presupposes an organized society, law, order, property, personal freedom, a love of political liberty, and enough of cultivated intelligence to know how to guard it against the encroachments of tyranny.
> A written constitution is in every instance a limitation upon the powers of government in the hands of agents; for there never was a written republican constitution which delegated to functionaries all the latent powers which lie dormant in every nation, and are boundless in extent and incapable of definition.

Mr. WILSHIRE. Mr. Chairman, this definition of a written constitution is sound in principle, correct in theory, and comprehensive in practice; it demands the admiration of all, and challenges successful contradiction by any. Because the Constitution declares and guards individual rights, it does not follow that those rights owe their origin to it. Judge Cooley, in discussing the powers conferred by constitutions, says:

> These instruments measure the powers of the rulers, but do not measure the rights of the governed.

Sir, with my understanding of the natural and inherent rights and powers of the people in this country, and the powers delegated by them under the Constitution for governmental purposes, I am constrained to the belief that there are great natural rights that the people have not surrendered, nor indeed can they, among which is the right to rule. It must be borne in mind that before we had a constitution there were usages, customs, maxims, habits of life, modes of thought, and methods of regulating communities—the precepts which have come from the revolutions which have overturned tyrannies, the sentiments of manly independence and self-control that threw off the yoke of monarchical oppression. If all these be not recognized as forming a guide for the interpretation of the Constitution and the rights of the people under it, then all there is left of our governmental charter is but a lifeless skeleton; the great principles of free government would be crushed out, and the living, breathing spirit which supplies the interpretation of the words of the Constitution would be utterly lost and gone.

Mr. Justice Story well said that "constitutional freedom means something more than liberty permitted." It consists in the civil and political rights which were known to exist, and which are absolutely guaranteed, assured, and guarded by the Constitution in one's liberty as a man and a citizen; his right to vote, his right to hold office, his right to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience, and his equality with all others who are his fellow-citizens. They are great, natural, and inalienable rights, and imperishable.

Mr. Webster, the great constitutional lawyer, said that "written constitutions sanctify and confirm great principles, but the latter are prior in existence to the former." The establishment of our free institutions is the gradual work of time and experience, resulting from a more thorough understanding of the natural and inherent rights of man, and not the immediate result of our written Constitution. Experiments in representative government both in England and the American Colonies finally led to the establishment of our more perfect system of securing and preserving the well-recognized pre-existing rights, affirmed in the Declaration of Independence as sacred, imperishable, and inalienable.

For the full and complete enjoyment of our natural rights under the Constitution, the most important duty devolving upon us is that of voting at elections for the selection of our public servants.

Elections, in the manner they are held for that purpose in this country, are but forms prescribed under the Constitution for the exercise of a great natural right, which, in man, in a state of nature, was the right to rule and protect himself, his liberty, and his property, but which in the aggregation of many people, as in this country, under a republican form of government, is the right to choose those who are to obey their will and execute their commands. So the natural right of the citizen and his duty to participate in the selection of public officers are reciprocal, the latter being inseparable from as growing out of the former. This leads to the conclusion that the rights of the citizen to vote at such elections and have his vote returned and truly counted is one that cannot be denied or defeated by any construction of the Constitution or laws of the country, or by the action of election officers or canvassing boards; and, when that right is attempted to be defeated by the action of any authority, such action must be treated as a nullity in the determination of that election, and the will of the voter recognized and regarded. This is the logical conclusion to be drawn from the theory of our Government.

Two questions are to be determined: First, what should the representatives of the people do in so great an emergency to produce a just and peaceful settlement of the questions presented? Second, how shall that be done? The former can be more easily answered than the latter.

It is the first time in the history of the Government that such questions have arisen. So we have but little, if any, light in the way of precedent to guide us. The modes formerly adopted do not now seem to be acceptable to the dominant party in the other branch of this Congress. To my mind the thing to be done is for the representatives of the people in both Houses of Congress to first, by all possible means that are just and fair, ascertain the true state of facts relating to the elections held in those States now called in question, and then, like patriots, forgetting party spirit, agree on some plan that comports with the genius of our institutions, and not violate the Constitution that will commend itself to the intelligence of the country.

The language of the Constitution, conferring the power on the President of the Senate, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, to open the certificates or returns does not confer on that officer the power to count the votes or to determine the important questions that may arise prior to the count. It is insisted by some that the Constitution by implication does confer that power. I cannot concur in that view, for the reasons, first, that such a power vested in one person, over whose action in so doing, according to that theory, there would be no control and from which there could be no appeal, except to arms, however wrongfully or arbitrarily he might exercise the power, does not comport with the well-recognized checks and balances running through our whole system of Government. Second, because the constitutional requirement that the President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House, "open all the certificates" clearly implies that the votes "shall then be counted" by the two Houses in joint assembly, and not by the President of the Senate. There are stronger grounds in reason for the latter implication than for the former, because the requirement that the two Houses should be present means that it was for some purpose: There seem to be but two purposes requiring their presence: one to pass upon all questions of the returns and their right to be counted that might arise; the other to count the votes, when it is ascertained by them what votes are to be counted.

This seems to me to be the most reasonable and harmonious construction of that clause of the Constitution. Any other would render meaningless, idle, and nugatory the requirement that both Houses should be present. This view is not repugnant to the power and duty conferred upon the President of the Senate. The universally recognized rule of construction and applicable in this case is:

That effect is to be given, if possible, to the whole instrument and to every section and clause. If different portions seem to conflict, the court must harmonize them, if practicable, and lean in favor of a construction which will render every word operative rather than one which may make some idle and nugatory.

The Constitution, construed by this rule, would undoubtedly deny the right of the President of the Senate to do more than open the returns in the presence of both Houses and leave the determination of all other questions to the two Houses.

It seems quite clear that it has always been understood by preceding Congresses that the power to count the votes for President and Vice-President, and determine all questions growing out of that count or in any way relating to it, belonged to the two Houses. We find that in the determination of Washington's second election this power was recognized.

Mr. Chairman, that has been the uniform practice heretofore, as shown by all the precedents. Up to and including the count of the electoral vote in the year 1805 the two Houses met for that purpose in the Senate Chamber, since then in the Hall of the House of Representatives.

The most important question presented for determination in the present case seems to be what is the proper tribunal to determine the votes to be counted. It will be seen by reference to the digest of the proceedings of the two Houses, made by Mr. McDonald, the present Chief Clerk of the Senate, that there have been five instances where questions of this sort have arisen and been decided by the agreement of the two Houses in all cases where the votes objected to were counted. Notable among those cases is that of the vote of the State of Indiana in 1817. The determination of that question elicited considerable and able discussion, and with very few exceptions it was held or maintained that the Constitution requiring the two Houses to assemble in joint session for the purpose of causing the votes for President and Vice-President to be counted imposed upon the two Houses the performance of the highest duty that could devolve on a public body, namely, to ascertain who had been elected by the people to administer their national affairs.

The mere operation of counting the votes, after it is determined what votes shall be counted, it must be conceded, is of little importance, when it must be done in the presence of the two bodies, and it makes little difference whether it be done by the President of the Senate or by tellers appointed by both Houses. The material question is, does the President of the Senate possess the sole power of deciding, where there are conflicting returns, which shall be counted or whether either shall be counted, and deciding whether returns presented are legally sufficient; or shall such questions be determined by the two Houses, when assembled in obedience to the command of the Constitution? True it is that the Constitution is silent on the subject, but it is quite as silent so far as the power of the President of the Senate is concerned. The two Houses being called upon to be present and, as I insist, enumerate the votes or cause the same to be done, they must of necessity possess the power of deciding what are votes and what votes are to be counted. Any other construction of the Constitution would render the provisionn requiring the presence of the two Houses nugatory and meaningless.

Heretofore in the history of this Government there have never been raised questions so grave, commanding the earnest consideration and impartial judgment of Congress and the people, as those now presented and which must be decided. Similar ones have arisen in the past, but in no instance did their determination decide the election, as will probably be the result in the present case. Therefore we are brought face to face with the issue presented and must decide it.

Up to the present time the only questions presented and disposed of were whether the votes of particular States should be counted, and in every instance in cases where the decision either way would not change the result. The present case is quite different in the effect of a decision, as well as the nature of the questions to be decided; for the determination of them will decide who was elected President, and we must not only say what votes may be counted, but will have to decide in some instances which of two returns from the same State are the true ones, if any be counted. Heretofore, when similar questions were presented, and when they could have been settled and some permanent rule established to govern in the future without being followed by consequences so serious as those now threatening, these questions were ingeniously avoided, or, in the language of a distinguished gentleman, "given the go-by."

It is unfortunate that some plan, either by legislation or constitutional amendment, had not been adopted at a time when no violent or serious results could have followed. But it was not done; and it now becomes the duty of Congress, at least for the purpose of determining the election of the next Chief Magistrate, to do so; and I most earnestly hope and confidently believe that there is enough of the patriotic fire that animated the hearts of our revolutionary ancestors remaining in the two Houses of Congress to rise in such an emergency above partisan feeling or personal ambition, and agree upon some fair and just plan for the settlement of the difficult questions presented.

The absence of any mode being prescribed by the express declaration of the Constitution or by statute leads to many and serious difficulties. I will call attention to a few that are presented to my mind:

The notion that it is the prerogative of the President of the Senate to decide, in the last resort, what are the lawful electoral votes that shall be counted is not to my mind entitled to respectful consideration. He is to open the certificates, or certified lists, sent to him by the electors; but that he shall count the vote is not said, and, if it was, no greater power would thereby belong to him than would belong to the Secretary of the Senate and tellers if the Constitution provided that the certified lists should be transmitted sealed to the seat of Government, directed to the Secretary of the Senate; that the Secretary of the Senate should, in the presence of the Senate and House, open all the certificates, and that the votes should then be counted, without saying by whom or with the addition of the words "by tellers."

The Constitution makes a man not a natural-born citizen of the United States ineligible to the office of President, as it does one not thirty-five years of age or who has not been fourteen years a resident within the United States.

By the twelfth article of amendment to the Constitution, the person having the greatest number of votes for President shall be President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed, and if no person have such majority then the House is to elect.

Suppose, now, that when the two Houses come together and the votes are to be counted, it is discovered, by any means, that one of the persons voted for is not a natural-born citizen, or is not thirty-five years of age, or has not resided fourteen years in the United States, are the votes given for him to be counted? Clearly not, for the purpose of finding him elected or of making him President. Suppose his ineligibility is not made known until the votes have been counted and he is found to have the majority required by the Constitution. He cannot be President. There must necessarily be power somewhere to decide that he is not elected President. There must be jurisdiction somewhere then to inquire into and determine the fact that disqualifies. If each House is to inquire and adjudicate separately and independently of the other, then they are two co-equal tribunals, and if one decides him eligible and elected and the other decides him not so, nothing is settled, nothing finally decided. One adjudication cannot prevail over the other, they being of equal weight. They reciprocally annul each other, and there being no arbiter between them, the Constitution becomes an ignominious failure.

By the Constitution, the person having the required majority is to be President; and if no person have that, the House of Representatives is to elect. A person not eligible is not a person within the meaning of these provisions. The words "qualified," "competent," or "eligible" are well understood; for otherwise it might be necessary to declare a woman elected President—a woman is certainly a "person."

Again, by the Constitution, if none have a majority of the whole number of electors appointed, the House is immediately to choose one of three receiving the highest number of votes for President. If one of these be found ineligible, must not the other, if there be but two, or one of the others, if there be more than two, be at once chosen? The House could not choose the ineligible person, and therefore it must have the right, if no other mode is provided by law, to ascertain and determine the ineligibility, to inquire in regard to it and decide in the last resort.

If no person have a majority the House is to choose from the three highest on the list, if there be so many. Suppose there were four, and the one who has the majority required is proven ineligible. To have a right to vote for the fourth, or lowest, the House is by the Constitution forbidden to consider the vote for the person ineligible, and therefore must necessarily have the power to decide for itself whether he is ineligible. If he is, the fourth has the right to be one of the persons between whom it is to choose, and to be President if he obtain the votes of a majority of the States.

It is not necessary to inquire as to the result, or the course to be adopted, if only two having been voted for the one having the required majority was found ineligible. Neither provision of the Constitution seems to cover such a case, as there cannot be two persons, excluding the person ineligible, between whom to choose; and the person eligible has not a majority of the votes "of the whole number of electors appointed."

Suppose, again, that four persons were voted for, and no one has the required majority; the House is limited to the persons having the highest number of votes, not exceeding three from whom to choose. One, then, is to be excluded. Which? The one having the lowest vote? Who, then, is to decide which of the four received the lowest vote? Clearly, the House.

Suppose, also, it was contended that the electors of one State, who voted for the person having the highest number of votes, were not the lawful electors of the State, but only made to appear so by fraudulent action on the part of a returning board, or by a certificate fraudulently caused to be given by the executive of a State? And suppose there were two executives, each claiming to be lawfully in office, certifying to different lists of electors; and that one set had voted for one person and the other set for another, and the question who had the highest or lowest vote must depend on the question which were lawful electors, and this on the question who was lawfully governor?

It is perfectly evident to my mind that to determine whether A or B must be excluded as having the lowest vote, the House must determine what are legal votes of the given State, unless there be some mode prescribed by law for determining this elsewhere or otherwise. If upon any such question the Senate is to decide separately and the House separately, there is a dead-lock between them and the Constitution does not cover the case. Must the House surrender to the Senate and substitute the Senate's judgment for its own? If so, then it will be idle for the House to consider the question at all. If the power to decide belongs to the Senate alone, the House can proceed to elect only when the Senate permits it by deciding that it has the right to do so. But no word in the Constitution sets the Senate above the House in this matter.

If the House should decide that Tilden and Hendricks have a lawful majority of all the lawful electoral votes cast, and the Senate decides that Hayes and Wheeler have it, and there is no arbiter to decide between them, the result is anarchy. Such an emergency as that can be met only by affirmative legislation or by amending the Constitution.

If there were three candidates for each office, and the House, rejecting the votes of one or more States, which if counted would give A the majority for President and M the majority for Vice-President, should declare that no one had the required majority, and thereupon elect F President; and the Senate should decide that A and M were elected, and should therefore recognize M as Vice-President, declining to proceed to an election, it is clear that one or the other would hold his office by usurpation and the Constitution is proven an abortion.

The Constitution contemplates no delay. The votes are to be opened in the presence of the two Houses and "then" to be counted; all matters of detail in regard to counting the votes are left to be prescribed by law. If there be found to be no choice, the House is immediately to choose the President by ballot. Either there can be no contest there in regard to the votes from any State, or the eligibility of any elector, the validity of any certificate, or any contest that may arise must be settled by the Senate and House. It is ridiculous to suppose that such powers are intrusted to the President of the Senate, even if he is to count as well as open the votes; to count is simply to enumerate, a purely ministerial duty.

It has always been a high and solemn duty, hitherto neglected by Congress, to provide by law for the due exercise by itself of this high jurisdiction. This House owes it now to the people to insist upon the enactment of such a law, or by proposing a suitable amendment of the Constitution, that republican government may not become contemptible. By the bill reported by the joint committee, the two Houses do not part with their constitutional powers, but prescribe a mode of their exercise in this great emergency, the importance of which cannot be too keenly felt.

In the last resort, it being determined that no person is elected, the House, having to elect, must determine its own jurisdiction.

It may be insisted that the questions that may arise in regard to the election and qualification of electors of a State must be settled in some way provided by the law of the State; that without the certificate caused to be given by the executive no list of votes certified by persons as electors can be regarded, and that the certificate in due form accompany the certificate of votes; these must be counted.

Suppose, then, that the Senate decides, as a matter of law, that the certificate caused to be given by the executive is conclusive and cannot be impeached, and the House decides that it is not conclusive and can be impeached. There is a dead-lock; neither opinion can lawfully prevail over the other; no tribunal can decide which is right. The Constitution dies of paralysis; as fraud vitiates everything into which it enters, even the most solemn judgments, it would be a most lame and impotent conclusion to hold that either the Senate or House must not only look patiently on and see a State cheated out of its votes, but even become a party to the fraud.

Suppose, again, that the ineligibility of one elector was not known until his vote was being counted; certainly the question whether it should be counted could be raised, and the Senate might decide that it could not and the House that it could. Suppose that it were alleged that the list of votes had been tampered with, or a forged list substituted, would this not raise an issue to be in some way determined? And when and how would it be determined, if each House would have the right to pass upon it separately and independently? If they find differently on the facts, all is at sea again.

There should long ago have been provision made by law for all these contingencies. To live under a system of government by which questions on which the legitimacy of magistrates and the peace of the country depends are to be submitted for decision to two bodies or tribunals at the same time, when if they disagree there can be no decision, no final settlement would be intolerable. A system or device like that would be discreditable to a less Christian and civilized people than ours.

The two Houses are not dummies, defenseless against frauds that shrewd rascals may perpetrate; bound to permit their tellers to count any votes that are clothed with a prima facie semblance of authority and legality without regard to their legality or truthfulness.

Sir, questions growing out of the late election have already arisen that must be settled or worse will come of them. Questions will continually arise which must be decided, if possible, without appeal to arms.

If no law be enacted on the subject and the Senate insists, to the end, that no vote shall be rejected unless by concurrent vote of each House, the House, in accordance with the well and long-recognized usage of both Houses heretofore, will insist that the vote of one House shall reject. If the matter stands thus until the two Houses meet to count the votes, with the question in dispute whether the former usages and rules of the two Houses are in force or should be observed, each body will of course adhere to its own views, and everything must come to a dead halt. There will be two Houses blocking each other's way, and the wit and ingenuity of man will not there be able to find a peaceful solution of the difficulty. There will be an end of constitutional government and anarchy will rule in its place; and yet we have fancied that we were wise enough to govern ourselves, and magnify the Constitution.

The Constitution provides that the Senators shall be chosen by the Legislature of each State. It will be remembered that when Mr. Harlan, of Iowa, was decided not to have been legally elected, Mr. Benjamin argued that no one could be legally Senator unless elected by a majority of each house of the Legislature voting by itself, and as the Legislature must elect as a Legislature, there was force in the argument. But by an act of Congress, after a vote taken in each house of a Legislature for Senator, if no one has a majority of votes of both, the two houses must meet in joint assembly and a majority of individual votes of members of both houses elect; so that one can be elected Senator without obtaining a single vote in the upper and smaller body of the State Legislature. As the Senators now in office were all, or many of them, elected in this manner, they will hardly venture to say that they were not chosen by the Legislatures or that the mode was not a fair one, and refuse to resort to it in another case where it would be equally fair, and where it offers the means of having fairly decided all questions that arise, and decided finally and peaceably.

It is unfortunate that a law upon this subject has to be enacted when it must apply to a case already arisen; but if it be wise and necessary, just and fair, for all cases that have arisen, or that may arise, and will avoid dead-locks and anarchy, it is of little moment that one party may, just now, win and another lose by it. Let the people see that the Senate and House are not likely to come together breast to breast, like two locomotives meeting each other, and that whatever questions may arise will be settled by a majority of their votes, and there will come up from them a universal voice of approval; there will be a universal sense of relief, a feeling of gladness all over the land. It is not the quarrel that disturbs the country, but that there is no lawful and feasible way to settle the quarrel. The people know that makeshifts will not do it, and that procrastination in this matter will only lead to further complications and more serious consequences.

The true object of both Houses should be, and I hope will be, in the exercise of their constitutional powers, to ascertain which, if either, of the candidates for President and Vice-President were elected by the votes of the people, fairly polled, honestly and fairly counted and returned, and honestly and legally canvassed and certified.

To accomplish this end, should the bill reported by the joint committee fail to become a law, it would seem that it would be right and just that a rule should be established requiring the two Houses in joint session to settle all such questions, and upon the question of wholly rejecting the votes of a State, or of substituting other votes for those prima facie entitled to be counted, the rejection or substitution should not be adjudged by a mere majority of the members of the two Houses in joint session, but by a vote of at least three-fifths of the members of the two Houses present and voting. This requirement would, it seems to me, free the mode of adjudication of its partisan objections, and secure a more just and satisfactory settlement of such questions.

The separate powers of the House are defined by the Constitution. It possesses the powers of the House of Commons of England in that it may censure the government, pass a vote of want of confidence, and compel acquiescence in its will by President and Senate by threatening to stop supplies. It only has to call into exercise its constitutional powers to at once curb the Senate in offensively asserting a superiority over it.

Mr. Chairman, the Constitution will not stand the strain of another civil war; it is almost in articulo mortis now. A dead-lock such as I have described is death to constitutional liberty, and another power than that of the Constitution becomes sovereign. Let us see how early that may come.

Suppose nothing is done by Congress in the matter and the Senate demands that the House shall, when the time arrives for counting the votes, repair to the Senate Chamber. The House declines. The Senate, in its dignity, refuses to go to the Hall of the House of Representatives. The votes then cannot constitutionally be counted. But the Senate alone, or its President, counts them without right; and the House acts as if no one were elected and elects a President, equally without right, because forsooth the electors have elected some one. A most alarming condition of public affairs would exist.

Suppose again that difficulty over, and the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House presiding; so soon as a question of any sort comes up to be decided by them and they disagree, who is to settle it?

If the Senate is to give its opinion and decision, and the House its opinion and decision, they will probably disagree; and here is the same difficulty. The bill under consideration is intended to provide against such a contingency; yet I believe the plan I propose of deciding such questions finally should by the two Houses in joint session, and, to reject or exclude votes, require a three-fifths vote of the joint assembly.

As before remarked, the questions that will arise are legal and constitutional questions, requiring for their solution the exercise of judicial powers. If to decide them two bodies of men, one large and the other small, have equal voices and can only decide by agreeing, the process is not judicial in its nature. There cannot be two judges, the Senate and the House acting separately.

A decision pronounces the conclusions to which individual intellect comes upon the law and the facts, and a final decision is that in which the larger number of the individual intellects concur.

The opinion of a Senator, because a Senator, is not entitled to five times the weight to which it would be entitled if he were a member of the House. Each Senator and Representative in the determination of the questions at issue is invested with judicial functions, and each is the equal of the other in this great tribunal. The decision of the right then must be according to the majority of individual opinions; but it may, and I think ought to be agreed and enacted that, upon certain most grave questions, the majority shall be of three-fifths, or less or more as may be thought best. It is my deliberate opinion that such a mode would satisfy all sober and just men everywhere.

The silence of the Constitution on the subject of determining such important questions does not argue that Congress has not the power to prescribe some mode by which such questions may be decided.

As before remarked, the power conferred on the President of the Senate, in the presence of the two Houses to open all the certificates, ends upon the performance of that duty by him; and from that moment his powers are no greater than those of any member of either House. The language that "the votes shall then be counted," clearly implies that they should be counted by the two Houses, or in such manner as the two Houses should direct. The power to count the votes carries with it all powers incidental to its proper exercise.

The power to determine what votes shall be counted is a judicial one, and the two Houses are perfectly competent to make all needful rules for a just and complete exercise of it. It will not be seriously contended that the exercise of such power by the two Houses is forbidden by the Constitution. Then, if it be not forbidden, and we find that it can be exercised by them without repugnance to the power granted to the President of the Senate to "open all the certificates," it is competent for the two Houses to adopt the mode I have suggested, or any other mode that will be effective and accomplish the much-desired end—a just and fair settlement, and the preservation of peace and tranquillity.

A similar question to those now presented arose in 1821 on the right of the State of Missouri to have her electoral votes counted. To avoid the question as to the right of that State to have her votes counted, the joint committee of the two Houses, appointed to consider and report a mode of procedure for the count of the electoral votes—it appearing that the counting of the votes of Missouri either way would not change the result—reported a hypothetical resolution.

During the discussion on the adoption of that resolution, Mr. Clay, a member of the House, in the course of his remarks said, I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. Clay said "he would merely observe that the difficulty is before us; that we must decide it when the two Houses meet or avoid it by previous arrangement. The committee, being morally certain that the question would arise on the vote in joint meeting, thought it best, as he had before stated, to give it the go-by in this. Suppose this resolution not adopted, the President of the Senate will proceed to open and count the votes, and would the House allow that officer, singly and alone, thus virtually to decide the question of the legality of the votes? If not, how then were they to proceed? Was it to be settled by the decision of the two Houses conjointly or by the two Houses separately? One House would say the votes ought to be counted and the other that they ought not, and then the votes would be lost altogether."

Mr. WILSHIRE. Presenting the very difficulty that I have endeavored to point out. Again in the course of that debate, Mr. Clay said "there was no mode pointed out in the Constitution of settling litigated questions arising in the discharge of this duty; it was a casus omissus; and thought it would be proper, either by some act of derivative legislation or by an amendment of the Constitution itself to supply the defect."

The idea that the President of the Senate possessed the power to determine litigated questions growing out of the count of electoral votes has never before now been asserted or claimed; on the contrary, the proceedings of the two Houses, from 1793 to the present time, show that, in every such instance, the power to decide rested with the two Houses. The uniform practice has been for the two Houses, for that purpose, to pass joint resolutions, in each case, prescribing where the two Houses should meet and providing for the appointment of tellers to receive from the President of the Senate the votes as the certificates were opened by him and handed to them, who made a list of the votes as they were declared; and in all cases of objection to the count of any vote or votes by any member of either House, the question arising on the objection has been determined by the two Houses, and in all cases requiring the concurrence of both Houses to entitle the vote objected to to be counted. In 1865, this time-honored custom was crystallized into the form of what has been known as the twenty-second joint rule, by the terms of which the persistent objection of either House would reject the vote of a State. I will now call attention to what will be regarded by the republican side of this House, as good authority.

In determining the election of 1864 for President and Vice-President, Congress passed a joint resolution declaring that certain States, naming them, were in rebellion, and that no valid election of electors for President and Vice-President was held in them, and that those States were not entitled to representation in the electoral college, &c. That joint resolution was presented to President Lincoln for his executive approval, which was approved by him and returned to the two Houses with a message, from which I ask to have read the following extract:

The Clerk read as follows:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives:

The joint resolution entitled "joint resolution declaring certain States not entitled to representation in the electoral college," has been signed by the Executive in deference to the view of Congress implied in its passage and presentation to him. In his own view, however, the two Houses of Congress, convened under the twelfth article of the Constitution, have complete power to exclude from counting all electoral votes deemed by them to be illegal, and it is not competent for the Executive to defeat or obstruct that power by a veto.

Mr. WILSHIRE. By that executive message of Mr. Lincoln, whose honesty, ability, and patriotic devotion to the Constitution and laws none will now question, the doctrine that the determination of all questions like those, of what are legal returns and what votes should be counted, belongs to the two Houses was distinctly recognized and officially announced.

Mr. Chairman, in conclusion I will say that neither will this House nor the people tolerate such an usurpation of power by any one person, however high in authority he may be, as that of assuming to determine alone those grave questions, except by the authority and under the direction of the two Houses of Congress.

Sir, the gravity of the questions pending not only call upon Congress to perform one of its most important duties, but are engaging the serious attention of the people of the whole country, and not of one section or class only. The people of the North and the South, the East and the West, the white man and the colored man, the rich and the poor man, the capitalist and the laborer, and producer and the consumer, are all alike interested in and affected by them, and all demanding a just and fair determination of who were elected President and Vice-President at the late election by the votes of the people; and they will and ought to demand that the will of the people, as expressed by their ballots, shall not be defeated, either by judges of election, returning or canvassing boards, governors' certificates, or the usurpation of power by the President of the Senate.

It is a universally recognized doctrine that, in all contested elections depending for their determination upon majorities, the power to determine will always examine the ballots to ascertain which of the contestants were the choice of the people. The questions before us are in the nature of a contested election; they, in their determination, reach back and appeal to those great natural and inherent rights of man, that existed prior to the Constitution or the creation of returning boards and rise pre-eminently above either when invaded.

Sir, the apparent calm with which the whole people are now looking on, awaiting our action, evidences to my mind their fixed determination to demand at our hands a settlement of those questions upon the eternal principles of liberty and human rights that this Government was established to maintain, and they will accept nothing less from us.

It may be said that in three of the States, whose votes will be called in question there was intimidation by violence and otherwise. It will not be claimed that any system of elections can be devised so perfect as to absolutely prevent all fraud. I suppose there never was a popular election at which there was not more or less wrong committed. All that human ingenuity can do is to prevent wrongs or fraud in elections as far as possible.

But why has there been intimidation, if any, in those States? Sir, every man who has been much in the Southern States since reconstruction, who will be frank enough to admit it, knows that it has been because the people of those States were not permitted to govern themselves as in the Northern States; that through disfranchisement or the unwarranted use of the Army the free voice of the people has been hushed, liberty imprisoned, and republican institutions virtually assassinated. Even now, in the State of South Carolina, I am informed by members of the committee of this House to investigate the late election in that State that, in order for its peaceful citizens or even high officials to see the governor or attend the supreme court, they must pass the outer door through a guard of militia and the hall through files of armed United States soldiers. What a commentary on republican government! What an insult to the memory of our patriotic fathers! Oppression and misrule stalked abroad in the land. What would not the people in the most favored of the Northern States do under similar circumstances, I ask? They would at once seize and fling the authors of such oppression into the ocean as did the early patriots' British tea.

In the Southern States where the management of their local concerns is entirely in the hands of the people, there are no such cries of force and intimidation. I will instance my own State, Arkansas. It is well known to every gentleman on this floor that before the adoption of the present constitution, which placed the power to govern in the hands of the people, the same as in the Northern States, there were continually complaints of fraud, violence, and intimidation in elections, and murders, for opinion's sake. Since then no more is heard of such things. The people of that State are as quiet, orderly, law-abiding as any in the Union, and the civil and political rights of all classes and color there are as cheerfully accorded and as thoroughly guarded and protected as in any State. This I understand to be the case in all the other Southern States where the people are not robbed of their rights to govern themselves.

Then, sir, the conclusion is irresistible that the causes for any violence or intimidations that may have been committed are attributable entirely to the false, wrong, and contemptible policy of the National Government, pursued in reference to those States, in sustaining a minority against the expressed will of a majority of the people, by the abuse of executive patronage, and the unwarranted use of the Army. Such practices are the legitimate outgrowth of a disregard of those great fundamental rights of man. The people, who have been realizing the effect, have discovered the cause, and, if I mistake them not, are determined to apply the remedy, by religiously enforcing the complete recognition of those great rights.

Unless some plan shall be agreed upon by which these troublesome questions can be lawfully and peaceably adjusted upon the well-understood principles of a representative democracy, anarchy and revolution will follow the failure, and the Constitution will be swallowed up. That expression, I hope, will not be misunderstood. Nothing I would deprecate more than war, and I know that I express the sentiments of the people of the State I in part represent when I say that they want peace and not war, and I feel confident that is the feeling of the people of the whole South. But, sir, while that is true so far as I am concerned, and I believe so far as those I represent are concerned, rather than consent to a surrender of the great right of the ballot, freed from fraud, or force, or defeat by canvassing boards or governor's certificates, I would not only accept but cheerfully invite war with all its horrors.

But I apprehend no such danger. I have too much confidence in the good sense and patriotism of the people's representatives not to believe that some plan will be adopted by which the questions will be settled without doing violence to the fundamental principles of free government.

Let any plan be adopted by the two Houses for the exercise of their constitutional powers in this behalf, that will insure the full force of the voice of the people and the white winged angel of peace will continue to hover over us, insuring perpetuity to the Government, and happiness and contentment to the people.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. I now yield one-half hour to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. TARBOX.]

Mr. TARBOX proceeded to address the committee in remarks given hereafter, but at the end of his first sentence was interrupted by

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, who said: I raise the same point of order that I did on the gentleman from Arkansas, [Mr. WILSHIRE,] that he must speak to the bill under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has not yet indicated the line of his remarks.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Well, I will raise the point in due time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts will proceed in order.

Mr. TARBOX. Mr. Chairman, I suppose that upon the question whether we are to have a country or not depends the question whether the representatives of the people shall in the exercise of their constitutional powers make appropriations for carrying on the Government of the country.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. If that remark is in reply to my point of order, I desire to say that the bill now being considered has been made a special order under a suspension of the rules.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has not yet said enough to indicate the character of his remarks.

Mr. CLYMER. It will be impossible for the Chair to determine the question as to the pertinency of the gentleman's remarks until he has heard what the gentleman has to say.

Mr. MILLS. I make the point of order that the rule which the gentleman from Iowa invokes is merely directory to members, and is like the rule which requires every member to vote, but which the Chair has repeatedly decided he has no power to enforce. This rule in regard to latitude of debate is simply a suggestion to the member speaking; and it is a question for him whether he will adhere to it or not. I suggest that it is calling on the Chair to take a very grave responsibility if he is to decide whether the gentleman is speaking directly on the question before the House. The subject immediately under consideration is capable, of course, of being considered from many points of view; and I think it would be very difficult for the Chair to say when the gentleman's remarks are foreign to the question and when they are not. The rule, I submit, was never intended to be enforced by the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has called the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts to the point that has been raised, and would request him to speak in order.

Mr. TARBOX. Mr. Chairman, I have a most conscientious wish to respect the rules of the House. Certainly I do not desire to transcend the rules as I understand them from the usage here. But in my brief experience in this body I have always observed that when the House is in the Committee of the Whole on a subject of this character, the largest latitude is permitted to debate; and I would ask the gentleman from Iowa to concede to me the grace which has never been refused to him.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The gentleman is not now arguing the point of order; but in this connection I will say that on our side we consider the proceedings of this afternoon as a gross violation of good faith. The gentleman's colleague [Mr. SEELYE] had the floor. He was requested by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] in charge of this appropriation bill to let the House go into the Committee of the Whole upon the bill. He consented with the understanding that there was to be bona fide consideration.

Now, if the question of the electoral count is to be discussed it occurs to me that it is unfair and unmanly to take the floor away from the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SEELYE] and give it to other gentlemen. We have had three speeches from the majority side of the House and there has been no reply. That is my point, and that is the reason of the feeling I have about this matter. Apart from this point I am very far from intending to offer any discourtesy to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. TARBOX.]

Mr. O'BRIEN. I was in hearty accord with the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] in regard to his point of order when made some three-quarters of an hour ago; and I then sustained him to the extent of my ability, believing that he was right. But as he withdrew the point of order and has allowed this debate to run for three-quarters of an hour, I submit that it is now too late for him to renew the point.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Not at all. I withdrew the point of order because of the plea made by the gentleman from Arkansas or by others on his behalf that on account of sickness in his family he desired to leave for his home and wanted to submit his remarks before going away. The question now is whether it is to be the universal principle to treat the rules in this way.

Mr. MILLS, [to Mr. WILSON, of Iowa.] We will let your side speak two or three hours after this is through.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. That does not often happen.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. We have had a regular run of speeches all on one side.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I believe that the Chair ought to put to a gentleman who starts out to make a prepared speech, as I presume this is, whether it bears upon the subject under consideration. If the gentleman says it does, the Chair must take his word of course; but if not, it is the duty of the Chair to rule him out.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair cannot anticipate what the gentleman is going to say. All that the Chair can do is to call the attention of the gentleman to the rule with the admonition that it has been invoked.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Then the honorable Chairman concedes that if the gentleman does not confine himself to the special order it is his duty to call him to order.

Several MEMBERS. How can he know?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. There are some things that members of Congress do not know, [laughter,] but there are some things they are supposed to know.

Mr. COX. As there is a point of order raised here, I desire to say one word. My friend from Iowa charges this side of the House with a gross violation of faith in taking off the floor our distinguished friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. SEELYE.] Now the gentleman from Massachusetts yielded the floor, and he yielded to two hours for debate upon the bill. This side of the House did not know the nature or character of the debate for the two hours which was already promised. I do not know but what it was definitively to be upon the Indian appropriation bill. But two hours were yielded. There was no lack of faith on this side, and any member of the House with ordinary ingenuity, as has been always illustrated here, can make connection between the Indian bill and appropriations out of the United States Treasury and the general safety of the country. And no man can make a point of order that will hold water. It is like pouring water into a sieve: you cannot possibly hold it. These points of order when made heretofore have always been overruled. All that can be done is what the Chair has done, to admonish the gentleman from Massachusetts to keep if he can within the Indian bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. What a spectacle is here presented, a former Speaker of the House indicating the way in which the rules of the House can be violated.

Mr. MILLS. I hope the House will come to order.

Mr. TARBOX proceeded with two or three more sentences of his speech.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I raise the point that the gentleman is not speaking to the pending question at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The gentleman has proceeded far enough to indicate that he is not speaking to the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Give him time and he will get to Indian affairs. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I am not disposed to treat this matter as one of levity. It is a rule of the House, and I wish it enforced. The gentleman from Massachusetts is not speaking to the question under consideration, and I call him to order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will submit the question to the House whether the gentleman from Massachusetts is in order or not.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I beg the Chair's pardon. He cannot submit whether the gentleman from Massachusetts shall be allowed to proceed or not out of order. If he does not take the responsibility to decide the question he can submit it to the committee. I ask then that the title of the bill be read.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Iowa that in the discussion of an appropriation bill everything pertaining to the nature of the Government necessarily may be discussed as pertinent to the question of appropriating money out of the United States Treasury.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. But this is a special order and the rules limit debate to the special order.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. This is the first time any gentleman has taken any other view than when in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on a general appropriation bill the largest latitude of debate should be allowed.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. But this is a special order, and the rules are that you must confine all discussion to it.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. The House has allowed general discussion for two hours.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. But it should be confined to this subject.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. But that general debate implies we shall have general discussion, and finally the gentleman from Massachusetts may reach a conclusion affecting appropriations under this general appropriation bill.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask to have the Chair decide the question of order which I have put to him.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already stated that he cannot decide whether the gentleman from Massachusetts will or not connect what he is now saying with the pending appropriation bill, and he therefore will permit the gentleman from Massachusetts to proceed.

Mr. TARBOX proceeded for a minute or two longer.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Now, Mr. Chairman, I rise to the point of order that the gentleman's remarks are not upon the pending special order. If the Chair is disposed to let this go on, very well; but I ask the decision of the Chair upon the point that the gentleman from Massachusetts is not speaking to the pending bill, and does not intend to speak to the question under discussion.

Mr. BANKS. I should like to say a word on this point of order, if the gentleman from Iowa will permit me.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. BANKS. I do not think my colleague who has the floor should be deprived of it on account of any understanding between my colleague from another part of the State and the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. Whatever mistake there may have been, it should not be charged to my colleague, who is entitled to the floor.

On the question of order I think the Chair is perfectly right. I understand him to say that he does not as yet so far understand the argument of my colleague as will enable him to decide my colleague will not bring his argument within the pending question. [Laughter.] It must be apparent to every member of the House that a member is not required to put so much force and vigor and convincing argument into his speech as will satisfy every member of the House upon the point which he is speaking to. [Laughter.] Now my friend from Iowa does not see the point in these remarks. [Laughter.] Because he does not see the point it does not follow that the point is not within the rule. For myself, I do see the point.

Mr. WHITE. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Only one point at a time can be entertained.

Mr. BANKS. I think my colleague is in order, and I hope he will be allowed to speak, even though we should not be satisfied as to the point he is coming to.

Mr. HOAR. State the point.

Mr. BANKS. I will. As I understand this is a bill appropriating money for the support of the Indian service, the Clerk will please read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The title of the bill will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1878, and for other purposes.

Mr. BANKS. Now, Mr. Chairman, I understand what is the purpose of this bill. I think I understand the argument of my colleague [Mr. TARBOX] up to this point. He has been speaking of the importance of a just and proper settlement of the presidential election and the selection of the proper presidential candidate. I do not think you know, Mr. Chairman, I do not know myself, but he intends to propose that the settlement of the presidential question shall be referred to the several chiefs of the Indian tribes—[great laughter]—and, if so, he is in perfect order, in better order, I say, than I have known any other member of the House to be in for a long time. I hope the chairman will permit my colleague to go on until he comes to a point when we can see, every one of us, that he is speaking pertinently to the bill under consideration. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Before I rose the last time to make the point of order, I was satisfied, as the gentleman's time had nearly expired, that he was not to speak at all to the bill under consideration.

Mr. COX. I desire to raise the point of order that all this does not come out of the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Of course not; everybody knows that. I want to reply to the point made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS.] When we go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of the general orders which are in Committee of the Whole, a member can speak on any subject he chooses. It is his right to do so. But Rule 114 explicitly states that when we go into Committee of the Whole on a special order members shall confine themselves strictly to that order. Now, the question at issue is: is that a rule or not, or will we defy that rule or not? That is the question.

I do not want to advert again to the manner by which the floor was taken from this side of the House and given to the other. I have spoken on that subject. But I want to know now from the Chair, and finally, whether that rule is to be enforced or not.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] state whether the Chair can do otherwise than call the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TARBOX] to the rule and ask that he confine himself within the rule, the Chair not being able to anticipate in what manner that gentleman will connect his present remarks with the question before the committee?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. There might be some doubt, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman rose to speak extemporaneously; but when he rises with a printed speech, I believe the question should be put to his honor whether that speech is pertinent to the question before the committee. That is what I think.

Mr. COX. O, that makes no difference.

Mr. BANKS. I make a motion which I think is in order at this stage of the proceeding. I move that my colleague [Mr. TARBOX] who is on the floor be allowed to proceed in order.

Mr. COX. The point of order has not been sustained.

Mr. BANKS. I ask that the motion I have made be submitted to the committee.

Mr. COX. The gentleman cannot make that motion until the point of order has been sustained.

Mr. BANKS. Certainly it can be submitted now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TARBOX] to the one hundred and fourteenth rule and requests him to proceed in order.

Mr. HOSKINS. I submit to the Chair whether as a matter of fact the words in the title of the bill "and for other purposes" are not sufficiently broad to make gentleman's remarks in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts will proceed.

Mr. TARBOX then resumed and concluded his remarks, which were as follows:

Mr. Chairman, if ever in the life of the nation a time especially is when moderation, a scrupulous sense of justice, and a patriotic temper should rule the popular heart and judgment and in the public councils, such a time is now. The country is moved to its depths with loyal apprehension both for the high interests of public order and the yet higher interests of the public honor and liberties. The subject of concern is the disputed title to the Presidency, and the body of the controversy regards the electoral votes of the States of South Carolina, Florida, and Louisiana, in each and all of which the authorities or persons in possession of the State government accredit the republican electors who, in form of law, have certified their votes for the republican candidates. If these certificates are admitted in the count by Congress, the presidential republican candidates are apparently chosen by a majority of one vote in the electoral college, provided the whole vote of Oregon shall be counted for that side. And yet it is the superior judgment of the country, and by no means a wholly partisan one, that the democratic candidates who received a quarter of a million majority of the popular suffrages are also, in an honest administration of the law, clearly entitled to a majority of the electoral vote, and so to the presidential offices. How vitally important the just determination of this controversy is to domestic content and the permanence of republican institutions is measurable only by the heights and depths of the love and loyalty the true citizen bears to the Republic. The investiture in the chief magisterial office of a claimant whose fair title to it is denied by the honest belief of the major part of his countrymen over whom he assumes to rule would include in its disastrous consequences the withdrawal of the respect due and cheerfully accorded by the people to their chosen rulers, and, worse omen, the loss of faith in the ballot as the infallible oracle of the public will and the sovereign arbiter of political disputes. The possibility of an event so inauspicious challenges the solicitude of all to whom the Republic is dear, and signally of those who, in official place, legislative, judicial, or executive, are called to deal with the matter in any form.

This, sir, is no partisan statement of the public situation. It is the common expression of wise and honorable men whose interest in state affairs is unselfish, except that they are nobly covetous of the honor of the country and the common prosperity. The sentiment of this class of citizens is worthily voiced in a recent utterance by one of the most distinguished orators of the New England pulpit; a man, no more eminent as a divine than as a citizen, who carries a conscience into politics. In his Thanksgiving-day discourse to his congregation, James Freeman Clarke, of Boston, speaking of the late election and its disputed result, in connection with our national perils, says:

> The result now depends on the vote of three Southern States, and the danger is that these votes when returned will be believed to be fraudulent and false; and that the will of the nation is to be nullified by a few men in South Carolina or Louisiana. That is the great danger now. * * * The highest crime that can be committed in this country is that against the purity of elections; it strikes at the very root of national life. That is what we are in danger of now. I myself am a republican. I have been so from the beginning; since the republican party was formed I have never voted any other ticket. I was a free-soiler before that, and a member of the liberty party before that; but I would a thousand times rather have the republican party defeated by an honest vote than successful by a fraudulent one. As the Southern States, on whose vote the matter now depends, are in the hands of republicans, the danger is that a fraud will be permitted by the party to which I myself belong. I therefore wish to enter my earnest protest against any success so obtained. The chief danger, I am obliged to say, is of a fraudulent electoral return by the republicans of Louisiana. The danger is from them, because the men now in power there have already committed the same crime.
> Let us fervently pray that when Congress meets the question of the next President may be settled beyond any doubt; but if any doubt then exists, let the whole people, let the honest men of both parties see to it that, after the fullest and most careful investigation, perfect justice be done. There must be power somewhere to do this according to law. It would be a very dangerous claim that the decision of who shall be our next President should depend on the Executive and the military force at his command. A presidential election decided by military power would virtually be the end of the Republic.
> There is another very serious danger at the present time to our republican institutions; it is the growing practice of sending United States troops into States at the request of one party to protect them against some supposed danger from the other. If an insurrection actually exists in a State the President should assist the executive to suppress it. But it was never intended that United States troops should be sent to assist one party in a State that took possession of the government to the exclusion of the other. It was never intended that they should stand at the door of a legislative hall to decide who should be admitted and who excluded. What was intended in the Constitution for a rare medicine in extreme cases has become our daily food. * * * As a republican, I protest against such interference by the executive power of the United States to decide by military force between rival candidates for the governorship of a State. It is a dangerous thing when the Executive undertakes to decide judicial or legislative questions, or to enforce its decisions by armed troops.

Preceding the election the discussion concerned the comparative merits and qualifications of the candidates as statesmen and as representatives of political organizations, principles, and objects. That debate is closed, sir. The merits of men or of parties are no longer in issue. The question is not who the people should have chosen for their rulers, but who as matter of fact they have chosen. There is no tribunal under the throne of Heaven to revise the judgment of the American people in the selection of the instruments and agents of their sovereignty. Our proper debate is as much graver than the debate which preceded the ballot of the 7th of November as the permanent government is greater than its temporary administration. Our institutions can endure the burden of even a corrupt and licentious administration and not be utterly crushed out. That we have proven. But the induction into power of rulers who hold not title by fair and legal election is the overthrow of free government. The constitutional right of duly chosen Presidents to rule is a thousandfold more sacred than the pretended divine right of kings. And, sir, it is the people in their original capacity, and never Congress, surely never the Executive, and only in one contingency the House of Representatives as the most reliable exponent of popular opinion, by whom Presidents are legally elected and clothed with the right to govern within ordained limits. Every free instinct, every in-bred feeling of veneration for the principles of the Constitution, every precept of our political education, every maxim of constitutional liberty, rise in revolt against the suggestions we hear put forth of a compromise of the question by agreements between party chiefs, and that in case of disputed legitimacy between contesting claimants of the presidential office the country shall abide the decision of the present Executive, thereby enabling him in effect to name his successor. As though it were permissible for the Executive to exercise judicial or legislative powers, or for the will of the people to be ignored and Presidents made and unmade by a post-election political intrigue! If aught of outrage could recall the fathers to the scenes of their earthly achievements, proposals so monstrous would surely cause their statues to break their marble trance and from their pedestals thunder anew in the deafened ear of the nation the essential truths of civil freedom they taught while their mighty spirits dwelt in the flesh.

Hitherto, Mr. Chairman, in our national elections no question of doubt has arisen that the popular judgment was fairly taken, and hence a uniform and complete submission in the declared result by victors and vanquished alike. This has often and justly been the theme of proud reflection to the dignity of our institutions and the credit of the national character. How chances it that now, in a season that should be most auspicious for peace and a satisfied and congratulatory sentiment in the land, as we recount the triumphs that grace a century of national existence, we behold the mortifying and unwonted spectacle of a country in passionate quarrel over a presidential election, months after the votes have been cast? It is not that the people are less loyal to the ballot-box, or less submissive to its decisions. The cause of the unhappy tumult, sir, is the suspicion, well-nigh if not quite conviction, widely entertained by the people that an attempt has been organized and is now urged on, in a selfish partisan interest, to falsify and reverse the true popular verdict by a dishonest and arbitrary use of the election machinery in the three mentioned States, and by the consummation of the fraud in the count by Congress; and certain notorious incidents and the course of events, all consistent with a corrupt design and conspiracy, have combined to confirm suspicion into belief. On the day next after the election, when the honest intelligence of the country accepted the success of the democrats as an undoubted result, the chairman of the republican national committee proclaimed a republican victory by one electoral vote. This assumed the appointment of republican electors in all the States of South Carolina, Florida, and Louisiana. No information as to the actual voting in either of those States was then at hand to indicate the result, and the general expectation was that all or a majority of them would vote democratic. What, then, was the secret of the republican chairman's boastful confidence in opposition to the general sense? Was it not his knowledge that the election machinery of those States was in the absolute control of men devoid of integrity and reckless of methods in the pursuit of political ends; whose private reputation and public acts were a sufficient assurance that they could be relied on to execute any baseness the partisan crisis asked for? The harnessed lightning was invoked to aid. Telegraphic messages from the republican national committee to republican State officials and party managers in South Carolina, Florida, and Louisiana emphasized the "grave importance" of the electoral vote of those States and exhorted a "most careful supervision" of the count, return, and canvass of the votes. A plan was incubated to ambush and capture North Carolina, by conspiracy with its pliant executive, if necessary to success. All this on the day after election. The pretense of guarding against possible democratic frauds is the thinnest of transparent disguises. The votes had been cast, counted, declared, and the returns were in republican custody for official canvass by republican boards, and the election at every poll had been held under the supervision of republican officials. Chairman Chandler and his colleagues knew their men. It was enough to suggest the "grave importance" of the matter to men so quick of moral perception as Chamberlain, Stearns, and Kellogg, and with the material support of "money and troops" the "most careful supervision" was not difficult. The answer was prompt and to the purpose. In sense, if not in precise terms, it ran thus between the lines: "We hold the fort! Who has the majority of votes we know not. But the invincible, the omnipotent returning boards are our garrison, and all the powers of the ballot-box shall not prevail against us." Chandler, the less of that illustrious surname, with other expert craftsmen, were sent to aid in "holding the fort." Federal troops, too, were mustered for the same valiant service. The chairman of the republican national committee seems to have combined in his own most sovereign person the powers of both the Interior and War Bureaus of the Government, and even of the Commander-in-Chief. He could promise Governor Stearns the use of the Army of his own warrant, without consultation with the Secretary of War or the President. In the conduct of his political campaign he has in effect been permitted the use of more power than vests in any official under the Constitution.

The intervention of the President in these affairs; the manner and outcome of it; the selection by the Executive, without official warrant and for no legitimate official object, of unofficial persons of no peculiar weight in the country, and all having a lively political interest in the result of the election, to visit New Orleans as sort of embassadors of the Executive; the investing the correspondence of these persons and ex parte testimony with an official dignity, and sending it formally to Congress as though it were the report of authorized agents of the Government acting under the responsibility and in the exercise of legal functions; impresses me as a most singular episode of our public history and, if not a gross impertinence, at least an executive indecorum most unworthy of imitation. Had the President been originally in the suggested plot he could not have more artfully employed his station to facilitate its operations. Was it the motive of the President in this action to establish such an inquisition over the proceedings of the returning board as that its honorable and fair conduct should be avouched by a weight of impartial testimony the country would be content with, and so the title to the Presidency be cloudless in its occupant if perchance the vote of Louisiana should decide between the respective claimants? If so the President was unhappy in his instruments. He should have selected men whose names were synonymous to the country of highest judicial temper and incorruptible probity, and representatives of each of the rival political interests. The men the President chose were all of one side of politics, and the steadiest of partisans of that side, chiefly known to the country for distinguished fidelity to the political interests of that side; chiefly too (and I mean no personal disrespect) men whose pursuit was politics and public employment, and whose thrift in that pursuit was largely contingent on the continued ascendency of the political organization to which they owed their present prominence in affairs, to which they looked for future preferment, and which must surrender its scepter of rule unless the vote of Louisiana could be scored in its favor. Did the President suppose the people of the United States would give heed to the opinion of judges so strongly prejudiced by their political sympathies and with so tempting a stake in the issue? Well, sir, as we know from the familiar history of these events, other gentlemen went to Louisiana by invitation of the democratic national committee. The democrats had cause to have representatives there, for, even in the law's defiance, they were forbidden all representation on the election board of returns, and had weightiest reason to fear a denial of justice by its arbitrary action; a fear abundantly justified by irrefragable testimonies spread on the records of Congress by republican witnesses constrained by honor and conscience, to which men of honorable strain are nobly subject, to testify the truth though it hurt their political interests. What of the men who acted upon the invitation of the democrats? They were men of unsullied public reputation, honorably known as prominent actors in the events of a great political epoch of our history. Not one holds a public office. Only one can fairly be classed as a partisan democrat. The others were eminent republican leaders when that party was in its best estate and in its counsels confessed the leadership of Lincoln, Chase, Seward, Sumner, Adams, and their compeers in character and capacity. They did not view the situation through an atmosphere of old political predilections or friendly prejudices toward southern men and affairs. These gentlemen were there to learn the truth and establish it to public satisfaction. They invited the President's agents to co-operate in the object. The invitation was declined. Can anybody hesitate in opinion of the reason for the declination? A criminal lawyer never defended his guilty client with more obstinate evasion of the fatal evidence than the President's select commission exhibit in their partisan report on the Louisiana election.

Mr. Chairman, the cause that depends upon a successful defense of the integrity of the Louisiana returning board is desperate, lost! That body has a reputation which no interested indorsement by partisans, who take profit from its venality, can dignify or rescue from contempt. Its character is legible in the record it has made. Of Madison Wells, the chairman, General Sheridan, in 1867, wrote officially to the Secretary of War:

> I say now unequivocally that Governor Wells is a political trickster and a dishonest man; * * * his conduct has been as sinuous as the mark left in the dust by the movements of a snake.

Again, in 1868, Sheridan wrote to General Grant:

> He has not one friend who is an honest man.

I commend this opinion of Sheridan to the reflection of such as confide in his judgment. For myself I frankly own I give little weight to it. But the opinion of the soldier, formed under no inducement to misjudge, is a fair off-set, with a margin left, to the opinion of the politician given under violent temptation to exalt charity at the expense of justice. I trust, sir, to other evidence not obnoxious to suspicion of malice or interest. The majority report on Louisiana affairs submitted to the last House by a committee of its most distinguished members of both political parties is characterized by a judicial temper that weightily commends it to credit. The House and the country are familiar with its substance. Inasmuch as the late election and canvass were managed by the same men who manipulated the election and canvass of 1874, some of the findings of the report are singularly pertinent. I quote from the statement signed by Messrs. FOSTER and Phelps, republicans, and Potter and Marshall, democrats, the majority of the committee:

> The registration was incorrect and exceeded the true colored vote. The registration was wholly in the hands of the Kellogg officials, with whom a republican committee, with United States Marshal Packard at their head, co-operated. In only three parishes did the republican supervisors of registration make any complaint of unfair or insufficient registration. On the other hand, very great complaint was made by the conservatives, who specified, with proof, fifty-two hundred cases of conceded false registration in New Orleans alone.

The Marshal Packard here referred to, who "co-operated" in the fraudulent registration, was the republican candidate for governor in the late election, and neither he nor his associates have lost their cunning or got grace since 1874. Further, on this point, the committee state:

> The registration of the colored voters exceeded by 4,000 the total number of colored adult males returned by the census, while the registration of the white voters was 10,000 less.

Upon the subject of intimidation the committee say:

> Of course in so large a State it would be impossible there should be no instances of refusal to employ or of intimidation. Such occur in every State. But the evidence certainly indicates no general intimidation of colored voters, and that such intimidation as did exist in the State was rather in the interest of the republicans than of the conservatives. The United States marshals, whose chief was chairman of the republican State committee, armed in some cases with blank warrants and aided by Federal troops, made constant arrests before election, but not afterward. The oversight of the election and of the returns was in the hands of Governor Kellogg's officials.

Here we have Marshal Packard, after fixing the false registration, carrying on an intimidation campaign by the lawless use of the Federal court process, backed by Federal troops. The conclusions of the committee are stated thus:

> We hold, therefore, that in November, 1874, the people of the State of Louisiana did have a free, peaceable, and full registration and election, in which a clear conservative majority was elected to the lower house of the Legislature, of which majority the conservatives were deprived by the unjust, illegal, and arbitrary action of the returning board. We understand the committee to be unanimous in finding the fact that the action of the returning board has defeated the will of the people as expressed by them at the polls on the 3d of November, 1874. The people then elected to the lower house of their Legislature a majority of conservative members; a portion of the conservative members thus elected were refused their certificates. This is an act of great injustice to the individuals, of gravest danger to the State and free government, and ought to be immediately corrected by any power competent to correct it.

A significant item of testimony is to the effect that the board sought to exculpate its conduct in throwing out the vote of one democratic parish by exhibiting an affidavit of Wells, the now chairman of the board, certifying to intimidation in that parish; and when Wells was requested to appear and substantiate his affidavit he refused to do so. Thus, as the committee finds, it results: that the Kellogg-Packard-Wells politicians, controlling the State government, the courts, and the Army, used these agencies to make a false registry of voters and systematically to intimidate their opponents, and then, beaten at the polls in spite of all, coined false charges of intimidation against democrats, and by the "arbitrary, unjust, and illegal" use of the returning-board powers reversed the result of the election. Sir, the stake these political gamblers, with loaded dice, played for then with such audacity of moral recklessness was the control of a State Legislature. Have they practiced the like desperate official perfidy now, when the stake is so much higher, and when a great political party, accustomed to power and loath to relinquish it, seems willing to profit by the crime and shelter and reward the perpetrators? Ay! millions of true men believe it, and clouds of witnesses rise up to testify to it.

Originally President Grant invited his agents to go to Louisiana and see that a fair count was had "of the votes actually cast." At that time the republicans claimed to have the State by the actual poll; no claim of intimidation yet. For days the republicans held firmly to their claim, but gave no figures and were very secret. The democrats claimed the State by a large majority and published the figures of their returns. Then was heard the charge of intimidation, but confined to five specified parishes. More days elapsed and then it came to be known that the exclusion of the votes of the alleged "bulldozed" parishes would still leave the democrats a sufficient majority. Here was an unlooked-for dilemma. The garment had been cut too small! But necessity was again the mother of invention. The conspirators were equal to the emergency; their knavish genius mounted with occasion. Fresh charges of intimidation, involving theretofore unchallenged polls, were set up. The law required, in order to clothe the board with jurisdiction, that the charges of intimidation, sustained by affidavit, should be made within twenty-four hours subsequent to the closing of the polls and accompany the returns of the commissioners. But that was ignored. Affidavits were fabricated, and in one and probably more instances corruptly smuggled into the sealed packages of returns in the custody of the board. Some of these affidavits were made in New Orleans as late as the 25th of November, when the board was engaged in its canvass. To effect its object, to count in the republican electors, State officers, and Congressmen, the board found it needful to eliminate from the canvass the votes polled in the whole or parts of seventeen parishes or counties. It did it with a bad heroism, fairly rivaling its former exploits in the same field. I suppose it a conceded fact that the rejected ballots were legally cast by qualified voters, and they numbered upward of fifteen thousand. The illegality of the action of the board in rejecting from their compilation, on the pretext of intimidation, votes of polls the returns from which were unaccompanied by charges and affidavits of intimidation, as the statute prescribes, is affirmed by the unanimous opinion of the committee of the last House, of which my distinguished colleague [Mr. HOAR] was chairman, and the republican vice-presidential candidate [Mr. WHEELER] was a member. The board repeats in 1876 the usurpation the committee convicts it of in 1874. Will those who condemned it then uphold it now, bribed by a share of its spoils? Excuse is sought to be made for the unlawful acts of the board in 1874, that they may have erred in good faith through an honest mistake as to their rightful powers, and so are not proven morally corrupt. Sir, that judgment may commend itself to the charitable, but the mantle is not broad enough to cover the sin from the eyes of the well-judging. The law is too plain for intelligent men to innocently err therein. But if the plea of ignorance may avail to extenuate their fault and save them from moral obloquy in 1874, it is worthless to justify or excuse their repetition of the same crime in 1876, when the illegal and wrongful character of their conduct had been made clear to the commonest apprehension.

Under the law of its creation, Mr. Speaker, the returning board, when constituted for the discharge of its duties, was to consist of five members, of different political parties, vacancies that might occur after its original constitution to be filled by the remaining members. It was, in fact, composed in this canvass of but four members, all republicans, with one vacant seat, which it obstinately neglected, though much entreated, to fill. Was the board, so imperfectly constituted, legally qualified to act at all? Be that as it may, the refusal to obey the clear mandate of the law and fill the vacancy with a democrat fully confirms the distrust universally felt by honest men in the integrity of the board. Were the purposes of the members fair and honest, they could not object to a democrat in their official company; but, if they meditated the wrong they are charged with, his presence in their secret councils would be inconvenient and undesirable.

One fact, Mr. Chairman, is incontestable: of the votes legally cast by the qualified voters of Louisiana at the election of the 7th of November as returned by the commissioners of election, a large majority were given for the Tilden electors. This majority is counted by thousands exclusive of all polls void by legal informalities. Upon what plea, then, is it sought to justify the setting aside of the chosen of the majority of qualified citizens who exercised their right of suffrage in conformity to law, and giving credentials of election to candidates who received a minority of the legal votes? For, argue however speciously, that is what the returning board has done. Well, sir, the reason assigned is that certain voters were frightened from the exercise of their right of franchise, and therefore, as some through fear did not vote, the lawfully cast votes of others should be null. Now, Mr. Chairman, if it can be shown that such a state of affairs existed in considerable portions of Louisiana as that the fair sense of its people was not taken, then let us pronounce the late election ineffective and invalid, on the ground it was not full and free. But there is neither reason nor safety in the proposition that a qualified voter who legally casts his vote shall be disfranchised because some other voter, for any cause, fails to exercise his right. To purge the ballot-box of illegal ballots, when possible, is competent to the proper authority, but to throw out a portion of legal ballots and certify the rest as the collected sense of a people of a State is a monstrous usurpation. Sir, I protest that the appointment of presidential electors is the act of the majority of the whole body of the qualified voters of a State who exercise their franchise right, and that, if in fifteen parishes of Louisiana the people were denied the free expression of their will and excluded from all voice in the election, then the election is invalidated as completely as though the same condition prevailed throughout the entire State.

Suffrage, sir, in its perfect estate is where the suffragists give their votes without thought of personal interest, fear, or favor, solely with intelligent concern for the common weal. But where is this ideal suffrage realized? Nowhere. In every contested election, in every State, the arts of intimidation, inducements of gain, threats of harm, and (by the lawless-minded in communities where the public authorities are imbecile to maintain order) violence and outrages are used to control voters through their self-interest, cupidity, ambitions, and fears. I doubt if there is a single poll in the Union wholly virgin of these influences. They are the most powerful where the voting population is the least enlightened and the local government the least capable. Deplore the fact as we may, it is nevertheless the inevitable incident of our system of universal suffrage. And doubtless, in my mind, these evils exist in rankest luxuriance in the State of Louisiana; not that the body of the people there are ill-disposed to law and order and the refinements and philanthropies of civilized life, but due, sir, to the utter imbecility of the government to enforce the authority of the laws and keep the public peace. Crime is unpunished and thrives on immunity; the courts and officers of the law give no protection to life, limb, or property; and society to save itself from utter anarchy submits to the irresponsible charge of vigilance committees and bands of regulators. Three thousand murders, they tell us, within a decade, and not a murderer brought to justice! What a government must that be under whose rule such things are possible; how unworthy of respect, how fruitful of disorder.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the election of the 7th of November in Louisiana was held under these conditions: The registration of voters was made by republican officials, and therefore no advantage was given to democrats in the registry lists; the officers who had charge of the ballot-boxes were all Kellogg's appointees; the republicans had at their command for the preservation of order and the protection of the ballot the police power of the State, the processes and instruments of the courts, both State and Federal, and close at hand, ready at need, the military forces of the United States. The election at every poll was peaceable and without any demonstration of violence. With all these advantages in their favor the republicans were beaten in the State by thousands of votes, as shown by the returns of their own officers of election. Intimidation, was there? Probably. But, as in 1874, the republicans did the most of it and profited the most by it. They had all the insignia of power, the possession of authority, dignified by the presence of Federal troops, to impress the fancy and constrain the homage of an ignorant and superstitious race of people, bred in servitude and accustomed to submit to authority. Add to this the despotic clanship rule maintained by the colored population over their class and the sum of democratic intimidation is readily seen to be vastly overbalanced by the intimidation practiced in the interest of the republicans. But, sir, it is profitless to attempt to balance these accounts. Elections are not so to be decided. The ballot-box alone speaks the public will. And if its decisions are not to be accepted as authoritative and final, popular elections are a delusion and republican government a snare. Mr. Chairman, the committee of the last House fully admitted the great evils the unfortunate people of Louisiana suffer from the gross maladministration of their public affairs. But, say the committee, "the ballot, not violence or assassination, is the peaceful remedy." Yes, indeed; while the ballot-box retains its unshackeled majesty. But, sir, how can a people defend their liberties, how redress public grievances, when the ballot-box itself is in bondage and its solemn judgments are overthrown by the arbitrary will of a cabal of men themselves the authors and profiters of the very abuses the people seek to reform? On the same page on which the committee write the sentiment I have quoted they record, as if in satire, their judgment that the returning board had by its "arbitrary, unjust, and illegal" action defeated the will of the people of the State as expressed at the polls.

As respects Louisiana in the electoral count we have not the case of a State in the full enjoyment of its right of self-government, with its seats of official trust filled by agents of its free election, for whose acts the people ought in law and sound political ethics to be held responsible. We have no need to take out the limits of the power of Congress to go behind the certificate of competent State authority in this matter. No such competent authority existed, unless McEnery had it. Those who had possession of her great seal had no right to its official use. Nobody of intelligence, I believe, now contends that Kellogg was in possession of the governor's office by legal title. The Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections, in their elaborate investigation and report of the matter, decided that Kellogg certainly had no legal claim, that McEnery, if any one, was de jure governor and would have been peaceably installed in the office but for the illegal intervention of a Federal judge supported by Federal bayonets. The House committee unanimously concur in the opinion. Since, then, all governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed, and since the Kellogg government was neither created nor existed by the act or consent of the people of Louisiana, it had no just powers. This must be true, or the Declaration of Independence is a lie and Washington was both rebel and traitor. The people submitted to it under the compulsion of superior force. But submission is not consent. They would long since have overthrown it, and would to-day overthrow it, but for the misapplied power of the Federal Goverment, which set up the usurpation by fraud and maintained it by force. Of this usurpation the returning board is a part. Neither the governor in possession nor the board were the qualified stewards of the authority of the State, nor has the act of the one or the seal of the other any character of legal sacredness. The Senate refuses Mr. Pinchback his seat, though his certificate of election is in due form under the seal of the State, because of the illegal constitution of the body that elected him. Why may not Congress go behind the formal certificate and inquire if the electors who assume to vote for President and Vice-President are qualified by due election and eligibility under the Constitution to discharge the office? And, suppose, upon full consideration of the law and the testimony, it appears to a clear demonstration that the Tilden electors in Louisiana were fairly elected and by willful fraud or legal error the Hayes electors were certified as elected and formed and acted as an electoral college, is there no power of remedy left us, and must full effect and validity be given to their action? Take, also, the Florida case. The republican canvassers of that State—worthy fellows of the Louisiana ilk—by similar illegal warrant stole the State government offices and the congressional seats. That plunder they have been obliged to relinquish to the rightful owners. Should it appear on investigation that they also stole the electoral college, is there no power anywhere to compel them to disgorge that too?

Mr. Chairman, I affect no skill to resolve nice problems of constitutional construction, and I wish to speak with due modesty. I reverence established legal forms, which I recognize as the body of liberty, without which its spirit is but riotous license in human affairs. But it seems to me incredible, in the case supposed, that no method is admissible by which, consistent with essential forms of law, the wrong may be redressed to the extent at least of a rejection of the false return. The consummation of so gross an outrage upon the purity of elections would shock the moral sense of the country and seriously disturb public confidence in the sufficiency of an elective system incapable of its own defense in a vital part. This question, sir, is not the exclusive property of the lawyers. The "plain people" are capable of an intelligent opinion upon it, and, in the end, are jury and judge.

The Constitution provides that the certificates showing the action of the State electoral colleges shall be severally sealed, transmitted to the President of the Senate, and by him kept until he opens them in the presence of the two Houses. Is not the obvious and only object of this provision to designate a safe and convenient custody of the certificates until they are brought within the inspection and control of Congress, with the inviolate seal testifying to their identity and that they have not been tampered with? When he has opened them his constitutional function is discharged. His specifically enumerated duties are to receive, to keep, to open. By what canon of interpretation can a power beyond the enumerated ones be conferred by implication? Suppose the constitutional provision, otherwise identical in terms, had named some other person or official as custodian, for instance the Secretary of State, as well might have been, would it be contended that he, by virtue of his expressly enumerated authority, was also to count the votes, adjudicate any contest, and make proclamation of the result? I apprehend not. And yet, I cannot imagine how the otherwise official character of the custodian can enlarge or qualify in the least the powers conferred. Were the matter in doubt, the invariable usage of the Government should settle the question decisively against the claim of right in the President of the Senate to count the votes. It has uniformly been done by the two Houses, by their selected agents. Whatever declaration of the result the President of the Senate makes, he does as the mouth-piece of the joint assembly, and the declaration is simply the statement of a fact the two Houses have ascertained. Obviously, sir, some authority must make the count. If not the President of the Senate, then who? Not the Senate alone or in conjunction with its President; not the House alone; but the Congress. It is an affirmative act and requires the concurrence of both branches as fully as a legislative act does. Congress has hitherto asserted not merely its right to count the votes, but has construed its powers in the count itself. In the count of the presidential vote of 1872 the vote of Louisiana was excluded by the concurrent action of both Houses, while the objection of the Senate alone sufficed to exclude the vote of Arkansas, though the House voted to admit it. But, it is objected, this was done under the twenty-second joint rule, which is no longer in force. Well, sir, a constitutional grant cannot be enlarged or abridged by any less solemn ordinance than a constitutional amendment. The rule was a mere piece of parliamentary mechanism contrived for the orderly and decorous performance of a power which existed independently of it; it could not add to or subtract from the measure of constitutional authority; and if under the rule the power resided in either branch of Congress by its negative voice to exclude a vote, that power existed as potentially before the adoption of the rule and survives in full vigor its abrogation. Whether the rule is in force for the regulation of the intercourse of the two Houses I do not esteem of great importance; but its value for our present purpose consists in that it was a legislative interpretation of the Constitution. By its adoption and practical assertion in three presidential elections, Congress has determined and adjudged, and affirmed and re-affirmed its judgment, that the count of the votes of the electoral colleges is by Congress, not by the President of the Senate or by that officer in conjunction with the Senate, and that the assent of both Houses as independent bodies is requisite, and the objection of either House is effectual to reject any disputed vote. Further, sir, this interpretation was made when the political complexion of Congress was overwhelmingly republican, and under no temptation of a partisan exigency to falsely construe the law. We may therefore fairly conclude it embodied the conscientious judgment of the able lawyers and statesmen who sanctioned it. No serious doubt of its correctness seems to have arisen until the reversal of the partisan majority in the House of Representatives. Where precedents conflict, the later are superior in weight of authority; but here is no conflict; the chain of precedent stretching back to the foundation of the Government is unbroken in a single link. Publicists and lawyers have developed divergent views as to the true constitutional construction and the boundaries of power, but the practice of the Government has been invariable. Always the two Houses, by concurrent action, have set up and managed the machinery of the count. Whatever the function is, ministerial or judicial, the Congress has assumed and executed it. In all cases of controverted votes that have arisen, those anterior to equally with those under the joint rule, the Congress took jurisdiction as of obvious right and without challenge, and in each instance the determination of the matter was made by the two Houses, each acting in its separate capacity as a unit of authority. Not only has the President of the Senate never asserted the right in himself, and always disclaimed it when the question arose, but the uniform practice, utterly inconsistent with such a right, is an absolute denial of it. If, as is contended by some, the Constitution is guilty of a casus omissus in the matter of the count, so that the duty to count devolves on no one, it is only the law-making power can supply the omission, and that has been accomplished by eighty years of Government usage, thereby acquiring the force and validity of law. I do not think Congress, had it the power, should abdicate its proper authority in favor of any anomalous tribunal unknown to the Constitution. Certainly not now, when the composition of such a tribunal must be governed by sinister calculations of partisan chances and interest, rather than by a conscientious regard for righteous results. Far better, it seems to me, to settle the present contest by the established precedents which have settled former like contests, and leave provision for future exigencies, if any be needed, to be made in a time of political tranquillity when selfish interests and partisan passions shall not be present to mar right counsel.

Now, sir, why not follow the trodden path, accept the construction and act upon the precedent? The time is not seasonable for a revision of the matter. The judicial temper is ruffled by the political storm, and the atmosphere is not serene enough for clear vision. If democrats are content to adopt the law of the republican precedent, with what show of consistency, or grace, or integrity can republicans object? The law, in my judgment, is right; its acceptance is expedient. It will pacify the political situation, disarm public discontent, and avert all possible danger to the peace of the country. Of one matter, Mr. Speaker, I hope we shall be scrupulously careful, as of a special trust. The House of Representatives, nearest to the people in the Federal order by election and by the nature of its responsibilities, owes it to its own dignity and to the people to guard and assert its rightful prerogatives. Let us, sir, wisely know our rights and duties and fearlessly perform the one and maintain the other; patient to counsel, but dauntless in conviction.

Both of the national committees of the rival political organizations, by their chairmen, have published bulletins to the country announcing the election of their respective candidates: and one of these chairmen, a Cabinet officer, with an air that breathes of threat, as of one who speaks by authority, proclaims that his candidate will be put in office. If this merely signifies confidence in the final result, it is well; but if it means insubordination to the constitutional authority which is to adjudge the result, it is ill. The authoritative decision of the presidential succession is not rendered yet, nor will it be until the united voices of the two Houses of Congress shall announce the election of one or the other candidate, or until in default of a choice by the electoral colleges an election shall be made by the House of Representatives, as the Constitution provides. Whoever that elect may be, whether Mr. Tilden or Mr. Hayes, he will be our lawful President, and the American people will take heed that he comes into the full possession and enjoyment of his right.

A majority of a quarter of a million of the voters of the country, and a million majority of the voters of the white race, have given their suffrages for Mr. Tilden. He is the popular choice for President. If Mr. Hayes shall be elevated to the Presidency over him, it will be the first instance in our history of a minority candidate preferred over the choice of the majority. And yet, sir, if that is the legitimate event of the electoral method, and Mr. Hayes is constitutionally elected, the people will freely recognize his right, for they are loyal subjects of the law. But they demand that the determination of the election shall be made by the authority within whose constitutional domain the dispute lies. They insist that the question is legislative and judicial, and that the executive department in no contingency can have a right to intervene. They will not submit to the military arbiter. They will not consent to a civil government that holds its tenure of authority by the grace of any martial power such as now makes its muster and lifts its front about the national Capitol. They want peace, but that peace which consists with justice and the dignity of a free form of government.

We hear forebodings and even menaces of public violence in the fullness of these events. Sir, who is to make the war? It certainly is not within the contemplation of the majority of this House. We have no arsenal but the Constitution, no weapons save the ones it arms us with. There is no power we claim, no act we propose, that is novel or unsanctioned by use. The entire scripture of our prerogative is written by the republican pen in the fresh records of public history. Our battle is waged under the identical standards of law our opponents have set up. Will they desert their flag? The people represented by the majority here, relying on the law and their right, have no occasion or desire for revolutionary resorts, and if any attempt is made to set up a revolution they will unite with all good patriots to put it down. They, sir, do not make revolution who abide by accepted interpretations of law and pursue the methods approved by usage. The revolutionists are they who in political crises insist upon the overthrow of established determinations of lawful prerogative and usages of government, and seek to set up a new authority by usurpation and force. We propose no revolution, and will consent to none. Nor will the people submit to one.

I share in no apprehension of war or its semblance. To admit its possibility is to doubt the public spirit, judgment, and integrity of the men in charge of the several departments of Government, and, what is more difficult yet to a lover and disciple of the Republic, to doubt the rectitude and power of the enlightened and robust public opinion of the country, before whose majesty the strongest partisan must subject his purpose. But while so confident of peace and the capacity of lawful agencies to conduct the nation safely through its difficulties, I enter an indignant dissent from the doctrine—unworthy of citizens and freemen; fit only for subjects and serfs—of peace at any cost. Public order is much; the public liberties are more. So thought and felt the fathers who fought a seven years' war to maintain their right to be governed by laws of their own ordination and by rulers of their choice. So think and feel their worthy descendants and inheritors of their blood-bought estate to-day, who celebrate their renown and inherit their virtues and free spirit. The American people, sir, do not forget the caution of wisest lips of patriotic counsel, that "eternal vigilance is the price of liberty," and they also bear in faithful and brave hearts the knowledge that the safety of their liberties lies in their constant readiness to defend them to the last extremity of resistance to aggression. They will not betray the free instincts of their race, nor shame the proud memories and traditions of their great history.

Mr. Chairman, the remarks I have submitted were meditated before the report of the joint committee on the subject of the electoral count was made; and I wish to add that while the views I have expressed are my convictions of the proper treatment of the situation by this body of representatives of the people in the execution of its constitutional trust, I do not wish to be understood as antagonizing the measure which that committee submits as the best product of their wisdom. It comes to us with a sanction of ability and patriotism that compels great deference. It appeals strongly to the anxious hope of the country for peace and order. I reserve an expression of opinion upon it until further discussion of its provisions.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. If I have made a fair count, two hundred and one of the two hundred and ninety-two members of this body have studied law, leaving ninety-one to represent all other professions, including the immediate Representatives of the colored race. It is not until very recently, Mr. Chairman, that I have discovered that the occupant of the chair is not a lawyer, and I hope there is no great impropriety in my making mention of this for the encouragement of the other ninety lay members of this House. It is not my intention, Mr. Chairman, in the few observations I have to make to disparage the great profession. On the contrary, I bow to it with reverence and respect; but, Mr. Chairman, I do not doubt that the legal members of this House are entirely competent and equipped to discuss the great constitutional questions which now agitate the country, including the status of the Louisiana returning board and the horrible conspiracy which my colleague, Mr. WILLIS, this morning so vividly revealed to us on this side of the House.

I say I have no doubt that the legal members of this body are fully prepared to discuss these questions to the end of the session of the century without coming to any practical conclusions thereon. It is the easiest and most natural thing in the world that lawyers should love to discuss such questions and become intensely interested in them, and the people are within certain limitations necessarily and always interested in them. God forbid I should here or elsewhere undervalue these discussions within proper limitations. But I say, Mr. Chairman, that the people of this country at this hour do not enjoy these eternal diatribes, for reasons which may occur to any gentleman who will take the trouble to consider the true condition of the country. Scourged by war and debt, sunk to the deepest pit of commercial and political demoralization, by reason of a genuine conspiracy, which culminated in the wickedest rebellion in all history, to which my friend did not allude, the people of this country cry today for wise and temperate counsels, for patriotic and practical statesmanship to lift them from a horrible pit to a better national life.

I wish to say to my colleague, who addressed the House in a very elaborate speech this morning, that if I understand the popular thought and heart of the country, the priceless boon which the people craved in those hours and days of supreme peril, now in my judgment happily passed forever, were voices of genius and patriotism, which, ringing through these halls, should be heard in every hamlet and city in the land, speaking light and peace to the dark currents of party spirit.

Sir, let us not deceive ourselves. The people thank God for the report of the joint committee made the day before yesterday. The mass of the people will confirm that report with a unanimity which has scarcely been matched since the election of Washington to the Presidency in 1789. The spirit and conclusion of that report will, unless I am entirely mistaken in regard to the popular sense, sweep and control the popular judgment of the people of this country as fire driven by the wind sweeps and burns the browned and parched prairies of the West in autumn. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the voice of the people will be listened to. I hope that the cry of the people from the North, and from the South, from the East and from the West, for better politics will be listened to. It must be listened to, or our institutions are gone. We have descended as far as we can go. We have to look upward, to act upward, not in the spirit of partisans. I say it without any disrespect—not in the uncharitable spirit my good friend and colleague [Mr. WILLIS] manifested this morning, in broadly intimating that the party of this side of the House and all who believe as I do in the election of Hayes and Wheeler are conspirators. Let us have done with all such stuff. Let all hard words be dropped. We have had partisanship enough. The people of the country will not be misled by such nonsense. They think and act, and will expect and compel us to act, on principles of eternal justice in regard to this matter, now soon to be settled.

Mr. Chairman, I rejoice to believe that we are now upon the edge of a new revelation, that we are at the day-break of better times. I think that the intelligence and patriotism of the people rule the hour and that every man who dares to stand here in his place and speak the words or make the motions of a partisan will be reproved. It should be so; it must be so. God grant that this House shall have the wisdom, shall have the patriotism to dispose of this question and to dispose of it in the manner proposed by this joint committee. Let us not forget that the people who framed our Constitution never dreamed of four millions of slaves being suddenly liberated and enfranchised; they never dreamed of such a contingency as we have been compelled to grapple with. We have been drifting here without chart and without compass, so to speak. No man will claim that there is anything in the committee or anything in the laws which provides for such an exigency as has now come upon the country.

Corrupt elections are no new thing under the sun. From the time of the consular republic of Rome to the last election in New Orleans, it has been so. Everybody knows that corrupt elections are as old as the history of republics. Why, then, all this howling about corrupt elections at the South? Was there no such thing ever heard of before? My colleague knows perfectly well that never on the face of the earth, since the name of republic was heard, have there been more shamefully corrupt elections than he and I have both submitted to in the State and city of New York. Every attempt to make the American people or the world believe that there was anything exceptional in the corruptions which have happened in this last presidential election, when made by an intelligent man, is insincere and unruthful, and designed to mislead.

Now a word further and I will stop, for I have already said a great deal more than I intended to do when I rose. I wish to be understood. I believe that the latest elections in at least three of the Southern States were an absolute farce. I do not think there is any other word to express it. I believe that must be the final conclusion of every fair-minded man. I believe that the leaders of both parties did all they could to carry their tickets, and the result was what I have stated, and according to the forms of law Hayes and Wheeler have been elected President and Vice-President of the United States. And I claim and sincerely believe that all the advantages of fair consideration are in favor of their inauguration; the cheating on both sides having been so absolutely universal that it is impossible for anybody to determine where the real truth lies. I venture to say that there is not a candid gentleman on either side of the House who sitting by my fireside will not admit most if not all that I claim.

Well, now, sir, it is worse than boy's play; it is a crime for us to threaten to tear this country to pieces or to mar or to destroy its material interests under such a condition of things for either party. I moreover wish to confess myself, according to the doctrines preached by my colleague this morning, a conspirator. I am a conspirator, if his conspiracy exists, and while I do not court anything disreputable, I think I can stand his indictment. If I understood him, he included among the conspirators those who believe that the President of the Senate has a right to count the electoral vote in case of need. But I am not going into that question; it is happily now in abeyance, and I am not disposed to prolong the discussion in regard to it for one moment to-day.

But I wish to say this much about it: if any dozen members of this House were to meet together to-night to frame a rule of action for every morning of this year, we should probably conform our action to-morrow morning, especially if it referred to an important matter, to the strict meaning of the rule adopted over night. Nobody will deny that. And it will forever remain in the archives of the Government that the framers of the Constitution, when they came to interpret their own words in regard to counting the electoral vote for the first time, elected a President of the Senate, there being no Vice-President, for the sole purpose of counting the vote, and it was in that way that the first President was elected. I think the framers of the rule knew better what they meant by it than we know. It is nearly or quite certain that their proceedings in the first instance were in strict harmony with their purposes in the language employed. That, however, is a question that can never be settled.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the bill be now read by paragraphs for amendment.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the committee now rise, in order that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SEELYE] may have an opportunity this afternoon to make his speech. I think it is but fair and right, after so many speeches have been made by others, that he should now have the privilege of addressing the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. Of course, if he desires to do so now.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. Of course not.

Mr. SEELYE. I certainly do not wish to address the House at this time.

Mr. MILLS. Then I withdraw my motion.

The Clerk then proceeded to read the bill by paragraphs for amendment, and read the following:

OSAGES.

For interest on $60,120, at 5 per cent. per annum, being value of fifty-four sections of land set apart by treaty of June 2, 1825, for educational purposes, per Senate resolution of January 9, 1838, $3,456.

For interest on $300,000, at 5 per cent. per annum, to be paid semi-annually, in money or such articles as the Secretary having jurisdiction of Indian affairs may direct, as per first article treaty of September 29, 1865, $15,000.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. I rise to amend by inserting after the paragraph just read that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Commissioner of Indian Affairs is hereby authorized to expend for the subsistence and civilization of the Osage Indians, out of funds belonging to them now in the Treasury of the United States, $100,000, of which amount not over one-fifth shall be paid to the said Indians per capita.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following in relation to the Pawnees:

For this amount, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for teachers and fuel, books and stationery, for schools, $3,000.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. I move to amend by inserting after the paragraph just read that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

That so much of the appropriation under the third article of the treaty with the Pawnee Indians of September 24, 1859, made in the act of August 15, 1876, appropriating for the Indian service for the year ending June 30, 1877, as provides for the support of two manual labor schools for the Pawnees, as remains unexpended, is hereby made available for the building of a school-house at the Pawnee agency; and so much of the act aforenamed as provides for the supervision of the Cherokee schools by the superintendent of common schools of North Carolina, and payment of salary to him for the service, is hereby repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I move that the committee now rise.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman from New York [Mr. TOWNSEND] will permit us to proceed with this bill at least until five o'clock.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. This is Saturday afternoon, and we must prepare for the Sabbath. We have heard a great many good speeches to-day, and I hope the committee will now rise.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman will not insist on that motion.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I want to prepare for the Sabbath.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is very necessary that we should get on with these bills.

Mr. MILLS. There is a portion of this bill upon which I desire to be heard. As there are documents and papers which I wish to use in my remarks, and as those documents are at my room, I hope the committee will now rise, and that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] will not insist upon completing the consideration of this bill this evening.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to say that it is going to be exceedingly difficult to have these appropriation bills prepared and got before this House and before the Senate in time for final passage during the present session of Congress.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I will yield to the wishes of the gentleman from Indiana, who I know is engaged in service upon these appropriation bills, the passage of which are very important to the Government.

Mr. HOAR. I would suggest to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TOWNSEND] that the best way to prepare for the Sabbath is to obey the commandment, six days shalt thou labor and do all thy work. [Laughter.]

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. As we have spent most of this day in doing nothing whatever but listen to partisan speeches, I think we have already violated the command so much that we should prepare for repentance. [Laughter.]

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. We have been doing so well for the last half hour that I hope we will be allowed to proceed with the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand that the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. TOWNSEND] is withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion is withdrawn, and the Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill by paragraphs for amendment.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill.

Mr. MILLS. It is now near five o'clock, and I move that the committee rise.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let us go on till five o'clock.

Mr. MILLS. Will the gentleman agree that when the paragraphs relating to the Sioux are reached they may be passed over, to be considered when the committee shall again sit?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, we agree to that.

The Clerk again resumed the reading.

Mr. DURHAM. I move that the committee rise. We cannot get through to night anyhow.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust that the gentleman will allow us to continue till five o'clock.

Mr. DURHAM. I want to go home.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope that the gentleman will not insist on his motion.

Mr. DURHAM. I do insist upon it.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HATCHER reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 4452) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1878, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the bill (H. R. No. 4307) making appropriations to supply certain deficiencies in the contingent fund of the House of Representatives, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed, and requested the concurrence of the House in a bill of the following title:

A bill (S. No. 1034) for the relief of Louis Rose.

COMMISSIONERS OF ALABAMA CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a message from the President of the United States, transmitting, with accompanying papers, a report from the Secretary of State relating to the court of commissioners of Alabama claims; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

CONTRACTS BY WAR DEPARTMENT BUREAUS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a statement of contracts made by the bureaus of the War Department for the year 1876; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

JAMES T. LEARY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report of the Adjutant-General on the bill (H. R. No. 1746) for the restoration to the retired list of James T. Leary, late of the United States Army; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PRESIDIO RESERVATION, CALIFORNIA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report relative to the bill (H. R. No. 1301) authorizing the use of a portion of the Presidio reservation, California; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

FORT UNION MILITARY RESERVATION, NEW MEXICO.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report of the Adjutant-General on the bill (H. R. No. 4304) to secure title to Fort Union military reservation in New Mexico; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PAY OF ACTING PAYMASTER.

The Speaker also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report of the Adjutant-General in reference to the pay of brigadier-general for the office of Paymaster-General; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

JAMES B. EADS.

The Speaker also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in conformity to the river and harbor act of March, 1875, a settlement in favor of James B. Eads; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

EMPLOYÉS IN WAR DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting the reports of clerks and employés in the War Department during the year 1876; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PAPERS IN THE INTERIOR DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, recommending the enactment of a law to provide for the furnishing of papers on file in that Department; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

JACOB F. RUTH.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4480) granting a pension to Jacob F. Ruth, late a private in Company I, Fifth Regiment Pennsylvania Heavy Artillery Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. SAVAGE, by unanimous consent, obtained leave for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in relation to the claim of Amanda Stokes, no adverse report having been presented.

ARREARS OF PENSIONS.

Mr. REA, by unanimous consent, presented a petition of 72 citizens of Buchanan and Andrew Counties, in the State of Missouri, asking for the passage of an act allowing pensioners the arrears to which they would be entitled by a removal of restrictions and to allow pensions from date of discharge; which was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

We, the undersigned, do most earnestly urge upon Congress the passage of the act allowing pensioners the amount of arrears to which they would be entitled by a removal from the statutes of the unjust limitation which has debarred them from receiving their just dues, and that they shall be entitled to receive in all cases pensions from date of discharge of the soldier; that a limitation act of the kind in force is unjust and that the representatives of the people had no right to take advantage of the accidents and incidents which have occurred in many ways, to prevent those who have made the most extreme sacrifice for the country from receiving the full measure of justice to which they are equitably entitled.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BANNING: The petition of Herman Levi & Co., of Cincinnati, Ohio, for the repeal of the bank-tax law, to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. BLAND: The petition of citizens of Missouri, for cheap telegraphy, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. CANNON, of Illinois: The petition of B. J. McMullen and other citizens of Illinois, that arrearages of pension be allowed pensioners from the date of their discharge from the Army, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. CAULFIELD: The petition of the Chicago Historical Society, for the purchase by the Government of the papers of the General Count de Rochambeau, the commander of the French forces in the revolutionary struggle for national independence, to the Committee on the Library.

By Mr. COX: The petition of Robert Fenwick, that aid be given by Congress to the public schools of Washington, District of Columbia, to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

By Mr. CUTLER: The protest of citizens of New Vernon, New Jersey, against the assumption by the President of the Senate of the power of counting the electoral votes, to the committee on counting the electoral votes.

Also, the protest of citizens of Green Village, New Jersey, of similar import, to the same committee.

By Mr. FORNEY: The petition of A. C. Copeland and other citizens of De Kalb County, Alabama, for cheap telegraphy, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. FRYE: The petition of Ann F. Greely, William O. McDonald, and others—78 men and 70 women—148 citizens of Maine, for a sixteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibiting the several States from disfranchising United States citizens on account of sex, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. GOODIN: Papers relating to the claim of Dennis McCarthy for arrears of pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. KASSON: The petition of citizens of Iowa, for the removal of the excessive taxation on banks, to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. PLAISTED: The petition of Harlan P. Sargent and 39 citizens of Brewer, Maine, for the purchase by the United States of telegraph lines for postal, military, and other purposes, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. POWELL: The petition of R. R. Little and 30 other citizens of Tunkhannock, Wyoming County, Pennsylvania, for the adoption of measures for the amicable adjustment of the present political difficulties, to the committee on counting the electoral votes.

Also, the petition of Thaddeus W. Hunter and 149 others, that pensioners be allowed arrears of pension from the date of their discharge from the Army, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. TURNEY: The petition of citizens of Greene County, Pennsylvania, for the enforcement of the provisions of the act of July 24, 1866, relating to the purchase of telegraph lines by the General Government, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. VANCE, of Ohio: The petition of Smith Partingale and 41 others, that pensioners be allowed arrears of pension from the date of their discharge from the Army, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. WALSH: The petition of Rev. Thomas Scott Bacon, that Congress refuse to recognize the pretended State government of the usurpers in Louisiana; that such wrongs to the people of Louisiana may be prevented in the future as have been perpetrated in the past by civil and military officers of the United States; that the perpetrators of past wrongs who may be reached by impeachment may be punished; and that the newly-elected President may be installed and maintained as such in spite of any fraud or force which may be used to prevent it, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. A. S. WILLIAMS: Resolutions of the Board of Trade of Detroit, Michigan, composed of members of both political parties, and representing the business interests of that city, communicated by telegraph, expressing satisfaction with the report of the joint committee on counting the electoral vote for President and Vice-President of the United States, and declaring that it receives the support of the commercial classes without regard to party, to the select committee on the privileges, powers, and duties of the House of Representatives in counting the electoral vote.

Also, the petition of Joseph Lovanger and 60 other citizens of Brownstown, Michigan, that pensioners be allowed arrears of pensions from the date of their discharge from the Army, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. WILSON, of Iowa: The petition of H. T. Bassett and others, of Blairstown, Iowa, for cheap telegraphy, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, January 22, 1877.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

CREDENTIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following certificate; which was read and ordered to be filed:

STATE OF NEW HAMPSHIRE,
Executive Department.

To all to whom these presents shall come, greeting:

Know ye, that Edward H. Rollins, of Concord, New Hampshire, was, by the concurrent votes of the two houses of the Legislature of this State, on the 20th day of June, 1876, duly elected, in conformity to the provisions of the Constitution and laws of the United States and the State of New Hampshire, a Senator to represent the State of New Hampshire in the Senate of the United States for the term of six years, commencing on the 4th day of March in the year of our Lord 1877, and on the 21st day of said June, at twelve o'clock m., the members of the said two houses being convened in joint assembly, and the journal of each house being then read, and the said Edward H. Rollins having been found to have received a majority of the votes in each house, was declared duly elected Senator as aforesaid.

Witness his excellency Person C. Cheney, governor of New Hampshire, and our seal hereunto affixed at Concord, this 14th day of July, in the year of our Lord 1876, and of the Independence of the United States of America the one hundred and first.

P. C. CHENEY, Governor.

By his excellency the governor.

B. F. PRESCOTT,
Secretary of State.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 19th instant, a copy of a report of Lieutenant-Colonel Q. A. Gillmore, Corps of Engineers, on a water line of transportation from the mouth of Saint Mary's River to the Gulf of Mexico; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the following communication; which was read and ordered to lie on the table:

CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, January 22, 1877.

Hon. T. W. FERRY,
President of the Senate, Washington:

I am instructed to communicate to you, and to respectfully request that you will lay before the Senate the following, adopted by this board on Saturday last, to wit:

Resolved, That the Board of Trade of the City of Chicago, representing largely the commercial and manufacturing interests of the Northwest, and without distinction of political parties, heartily approves the report of the joint congressional committee for the final determination of all questions as to the late election of presidential electors and the counting of their votes.

By order of the board.

CHAS. RANDOLPH, Secretary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a memorial of the General Assembly of Colorado, in favor of an appropriation by Congress for the establishment of a military wagon-road from White River agency, Summit County, to Hot Sulphur Springs, Grand County; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WINDOM. I present a memorial of a large number of soldiers of the Mexican war, respectfully calling the attention of the Federal Government to the fact that as one of the results of their service in connection with the regular and volunteer Army we acquired the golden State of California and the Territory of New Mexico and settled the boundary of Texas, and that some further recognition of such service is due the few survivors of that war after a lapse of twenty-seven years. They therefore "petition your honorable body that we may be placed upon the pension-rolls of our country." I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CHAFFEE presented the petition of Alida C. Avery, N. W. Smith, and others—15 men and 12 women—27 citizens of the State of Colorado, praying for a sixteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibiting the several States from disfranchising United States citizens on account of sex; which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. WRIGHT. I am requested to present the petition of O. W. Garrison and a large number of citizens of Iowa Falls, Iowa, complaining of the unjust limitations of the present law touching pensions, and praying for relief. As the subject has been reported upon, I suggest that the petition lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will lie on the table.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, presented the petition of Lavinia Goodell, Mathilde Franceske Anneke, Carl Doerflinger, and others—213 men and 264 women—477 citizens of the State of Wisconsin, praying for a sixteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibiting the several States from disfranchising United States citizens on account of sex; which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. KERNAN presented the petition of Jesse Howell, of New York, a sea-faring man, praying compensation out of the fund known as the Geneva award for loss and damages sustained by him by the destruction of an American vessel of which he was an officer by the confederate cruiser Florida; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BURNSIDE presented the petition of Catharine Cornell Knowles, John C. Nichols, and others—56 men and 70 women—126 citizens of the State of Rhode Island, praying for a sixteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibiting the several States from disfranchising United States citizens on account of sex; which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. SHERMAN presented two petitions of citizens of Ohio, praying the modification of the pension laws so as to allow pensioners to receive pensions from the date of discharge of the soldier; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. ALLISON. I present a petition signed by a large number of citizens of Iowa, praying for an amendment to the pension laws allowing pensioners the amount of arrears to which they would be entitled by a removal from the statutes of the unjust limitation which has debarred many from receiving their just dues, and that they shall be entitled to receive in all cases pension from the date of the discharge of the soldier. Inasmuch as a bill has been reported, I move that the petition lie upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSTON presented a petition of numerous citizens of Virginia, praying for an amicable adjustment of the questions arising out of the late presidential election; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MAXEY presented the petition of a large number of citizens of Lamar County, Texas, praying the passage of such law as shall enforce the passage of the act approved July 24, 1866, entitled "An act to aid in the construction of telegraph lines, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes;" which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. CRAGIN presented the petition of Caroline H. Barr, Elizabeth S. Preston, E. A. Barrett, and others—7 men and 15 women—22 citizens of the State of New Hampshire, praying for a sixteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibiting the several States from disfranchising United States citizens on account of sex; which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. CRAGIN. I present the memorial of 50 citizens of the city of Manchester, New Hampshire, praying that the limitation clause, so called, of the pension act be repealed, and for the passage of a law authorizing the payment of pensions in all cases to date from the time of the soldier's discharge. I believe a bill has been reported upon that subject; I therefore move that the memorial lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BOUTWELL presented the petition of Eben Shute and others, citizens of Massachusetts, praying an amendment to the pension laws so as to allow arrears of pensions; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the petition of H. Hosford and 51 other citizens of Massachusetts, in favor of the passage of the bill providing for the settlement of questions arising from the recent presidential election; which was ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 587) for the relief of Jacob Theirer, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1168) to provide for the distribution of the awards made under the convention between the United States and the republic of Mexico, concluded the 4th day of July, 1868; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. COCKRELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1169) granting a pension to Mrs. Apoline A. Blair, widow of the late Major-General Francis P. Blair, jr., deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WINDOM asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1170) for the relief of E. F. Wenckebach; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying petition, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1171) to provide for furnishing copies of papers on file at the Interior Department and the bureaus thereof; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. WINDOM. I hardly know to which committee the bill should be referred, as it covers several bureaus represented by different committees.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would suggest the Committee to Examine the Several Branches of the Civil Service.

Mr. WINDOM. As the bill was sent by the Secretary of the Interior to the Committee on Appropriations, I would ask to have it referred to that committee, but I have no choice about the matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, if there be no objection.

Mr. MERRIMON. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill, and I should like to say a word or two in explanation of its purpose. Some practical experience, together with my general observation in the Senate, satisfies me that the practice which has now become very common, of sending committees composed of Senators abroad, especially while Congress is in session, to take testimony and gather information for the use of the Senate, is unwise if not vicious. It virtually, in many instances, deprives many of the States of part of their just representation. Lately, for more than a month, the State of Wisconsin was without representation at a time of great moment, when grave questions involving the perpetuity of the country were under consideration. In that case a State was absolutely deprived of representation. Twelve States for more than a month, and some of them at this time, have been deprived of part of their representation, one-half their representation, half their voice, in this body. In addition to that, such service while the Congress is in session goes very far to unfit a Senator for business when he shall return to the Senate. He loses the course of business; he loses the history of the measures before the Senate and in Congress; he is behind in that practical information that he ought to have about every measure in order to enable him to do efficient service. When he returns he must catch up with business, study the questions anew, while all the Senators who have remained at their places have become entirely familiar with them. This is not wise or fair to the Senator sent abroad or to the country.

In addition to that, it involves a vast expenditure of money which is unnecessary in my judgment. This service might be done in another way, through commissions, quite as well as, indeed I venture to say better than, it can be done by committees composed of Senators. My recent experience on a committee sent to the State of South Carolina has satisfied me that a commissioner, or two commissioners, could have taken the testimony more advantageously to the Senate and to the country than the committee of Senators did. We were entire strangers to that community; we did not know the various localities from which witnesses were called; we knew nothing of the witnesses; we were unfamiliar with what they were testifying to; we knew nothing of the history of the controversies there which it was very essential to know when taking testimony, in order to arrive at the truth. A commissioner or commissioners need not be subject to this disadvantage, especially if he or they were allowed to call to their aid counsel familiar with the witnesses, the localities, and controversies and subjects to be examined.

I merely make these remarks in order to call the attention of the Senate to the character and what I consider the importance of the bill which I now desire to introduce and have referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

At the proper time, in the course of the morning hour, I propose to introduce a resolution declaring that it is not within the lawful power of the Senate to send a committee composed of Senators abroad to take testimony, or to gather information for any purpose, while the Senate is in session. I wish to test the judgment of the Senate on this subject.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 1172) providing for taking testimony and collecting information to be used by Congress; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CONOVER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1173) for the relief of Frederick R. Smith; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BOGY (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1174) to organize the Territory of Oklahoma and for the better protection of the Indians therein, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

BUILDING FOR CENTENNIAL EXHIBITS.

Mr. MORRILL submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That all that portion of the President's message in relation to providing a suitable building for the permanent accommodation of the Government exhibits at the centennial exhibition, and of the very large donations to the Government by many other nations of valuable contributions, be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, with instructions to report thereon by bill or otherwise.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. MERRIMON submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Resolved, That it is not within the lawful authority of the Senate to charge committees composed of Senators with duties to be performed away from the Capitol while the Senate is in session.

REPORT OF DISTRICT BOARD OF HEALTH.

Mr. SHERMAN submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That 1,000 extra copies of the report of the board of health of the District of Columbia for the year 1876 be printed for use and distribution by said board.

M'GREGOR WESTERN RAILROAD.

Mr. WRIGHT. I ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4168) to amend section 1 of the act of May 12, 1864, for a grant of lands to the State of Iowa to aid in the construction of a railroad in said State.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WEST. What committee reported the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WEST. If we cannot have any explanation of it until after it is taken up, I shall not object.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. WRIGHT. There are certain amendments to this bill that do not change at all its purport or meaning that I propose to offer, and have the concurrence and approval of the acting chairman of the Committee on Public Lands. They seem to be necessary in order to avoid all possible misconstruction of its language. I do not regard them as changes at all. I offer this as the first amendment to the bill——

Mr. WEST. I would ask the Senator from Iowa whether there is any report in the case?

Mr. WRIGHT. There is no report. The Senator from Louisiana, he will allow me to say, was not in when I explained the bill the other morning.

Mr. WEST. I am sorry I was not here.

Mr. WRIGHT. As the law stands now, there is provision made for two roads, one from Sioux City running to the northern line of the State of Iowa; the other from McGregor running west, and the law provides that the road running from McGregor west shall strike the other road in the county of O'Brien. It has so occurred that in the construction of the road from Sioux City north, it only touches the northwest corner of O'Brien County; and hence the road from McGregor in order to strike that road in O'Brien County must be diverted to the north, whereas it is proposed that it shall strike it immediately west of that county and keep on the forty-third parallel.

The first amendment is to come in at the top of the second page and omitting the last word "to" on the first page. After the word "company," in line 3, I move to strike out the words "to which the State of Iowa has made, or may hereafter make, the grant of the lands applicable to the completion of said road."

And in lieu thereof insert the words:

Which now is or hereafter may be by the laws of the State of Iowa entitled to complete said road and receive the lands granted for and applicable to the same.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. I now offer this amendment: after the word "line" in line 9 page 2 to insert "as now constructed;" so as to read:

Intersect said road leading from Sioux City to the Minnesota State line, as now constructed, at a point outside and west of the said county of O'Brien.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. I offer this amendment: after the word "act" in line 16 to insert "of Congress or of the State of Iowa;" so as to read:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to in any manner change the grant of land made to either of said roads by said act of May 12, 1864, or any other act of Congress or of the State of Iowa, or to increase or change the lands taken under said grant.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. I offer this amendment: in line 19 after the word "settler" to insert "or any other railroad company;" so as to read:

And provided further, That this act shall not be so construed as to change or affect the rights of any homestead or pre-emption settler, or any other railroad company, nor to extend the time for the completion of said McGregor Western Railroad.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. This is a bill of very considerable importance, and involves the consideration of one or two questions in regard to the rights of homestead and pre-emption settlers to which the attention of the Senate has not yet been called.

This is, as I understand it, a railroad that is built by a grant of land for a certain number of miles upon either side. The bill proposes to change the terminus of the road, and of course changes its route. It must change its route if it changes its terminus. Under the operation of the laws that grant lands to railroad companies, the reserved sections for homestead and pre-emption become what is known as double-minimum lands; that is to say, if taken by a pre-emption settler he is compelled to pay two dollars and a half an acre, if taken by a homestead settler he obtains but eighty acres instead of one hundred and sixty that he would be authorized to obtain under the provisions of the homestead law in lands not within railroad limits.

The Senator from Iowa in his statement the other day said that this bill carefully guarded the rights of homestead and pre-emption settlers, but he will observe that if by the change of route of this railroad any homestead or pre-emption settlers who have taken double-minimum lands are thrown outside of the railroad limits, their rights are not protected. In other words, they are put in precisely the same category as homestead and pre-emption settlers in lands not within railroad limits, but they have paid two dollars and a half an acre for their land if they are pre-emption settlers, or have obtained but eighty acres if they are homestead settlers. In order to obviate that difficulty, and I suppose the Senator will see that it should be obviated, I propose the following amendment to the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is it offered as an additional section?

Mr. INGALLS. No; I move to strike out the proviso after the word "further" in line 17, and insert in place of that what I have sent to the desk and ask to have read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The words proposed to be stricken out are as follows:

That this act shall not be so construed as to change or affect the rights of any homestead or pre-emption settler, or any other railroad company, nor to extend the time for the completion of said McGregor Western Railroad; it being the sole and true intent and meaning of this act to give consent to the change of the western terminus of said road as herein declared.

In lieu of these words it is proposed to insert:

In all cases where settlers upon public lands under the provisions of the pre-emption laws of the United States shall have paid double-minimum prices by reason of their location within said railroad route, which route shall be so changed by the location of said road herein provided for as to exclude said lands from the limits within which double minimum price is to be charged, the excess above $1.25 per acre shall be refunded to the persons paying the same, or his legal representatives. And that settlers under the homestead laws who by reason of such withdrawal and subsequent change have received but eighty acres of land shall be entitled to eighty acres additional, to be selected from any of the public lands of the United States open to settlement or pre-emption at the minimum price.

Mr. WRIGHT. I am sure that my friend from Kansas does not propose this as an amendment to strike out what he proposes and insert what he has sent to the Chair.

Mr. INGALLS. That is my intention.

Mr. WRIGHT. I shall oppose it, and shall oppose it as an amendment even if the language sought to be stricken out is retained. He proposes to strike this out, whereas we propose in a mere local matter to make provision that there shall be no further extension of the time for the completion of this railroad. He proposes to strike that out.

Mr. INGALLS. No.

Mr. WRIGHT. I understand that he proposes to strike out all of the last proviso.

Mr. INGALLS. I propose to strike out the portion of the bill from lines 17 to 23, inclusive, after the word "further."

Mr. WRIGHT. That is what I understand.

Mr. INGALLS. And the object of that proviso, if I understand the Senator from Iowa, is simply to protect the rights of homestead and pre-emption settlers.

Mr. WRIGHT. More than that, because it expressly provides "nor to extend the time for the completion of said McGregor Western Railroad."

Mr. INGALLS. So far as that language is concerned, I have no objection to its being retained.

Mr. WRIGHT. The Senator proposes to strike it all out.

Mr. INGALLS. I did not observe that clause there with regard to the time of the completion of the road, and of course I do not desire to interfere with that one way or the other. My object is to have a definition of the rights of the homestead and pre-emption settlers within these railroad limits; and if by the change contemplated by this bill men who have paid two dollars and a half an acre for land, or have obtained but eighty acres of land, are thrown outside the railroad limits, that then they shall be placed in the same category as other settlers on the public lands are.

Mr. WRIGHT. I trust that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas will not be agreed to by the Senate, especially in the form in which it is now proposed, for his proposition is to strike out all the last proviso and insert what he has sent to the desk.

Mr. INGALLS. I will modify that by including the clause to which the Senator has referred.

Mr. WRIGHT. How the amendment would stand then I should like to have reported from the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported as modified.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert after the word "grant," in line 17, the following proviso:

And provided, That in all cases where settlers upon public lands under the provisions of the pre-emption laws of the United States shall have paid double minimum price by reason of their location within any designated railroad route, which route shall be so changed by the location of said road herein provided for as to exclude said lands from the limits within which double minimum price is to be charged, the excess above $1.25 per acre shall be refunded to the person so paying the same, or his legal representatives. And that settlers under the homestead laws who, by reason of such withdrawal and subsequent change, have received but eighty acres of land shall be entitled to eighty acres additional, to be selected from any of the public lands of the United States open to settlement or pre-emption at the minimum price.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The words mentioned by the Senator from Iowa are retained in the bill by this amendment.

Mr. WRIGHT. Do I understand that that does not strike out anything, but leaves the bill as it is, with this as an additional proviso? This bill was reported by the Committee on Public Lands after full consideration of all its terms and provisions. It is purely and simply a local bill. The Legislature of the State of Iowa has asked Congress to authorize a change in the western terminus of this road running from McGregor, and that alone. It will make a change of the road of a very few miles. When the law was originally passed it was contemplated that the road to the northern line of Iowa would run through the center of O'Brien County. It turns out that it runs through the northwest township. Now, to strike that road in O'Brien County it must diverge some twenty miles from the forty-third parallel. This bill authorizes them to continue the road so as to strike it west of O'Brien County within a few miles beyond its western line. It expressly saves the rights of all settlers. It expressly provides that nothing herein contained shall be construed to extend the time for the completion of the road and that nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to change the subsidy that has been given to the road; it shall remain the same as it has now been selected, it being said in the last clause of the bill:

It being the sole and true intent and meaning of this act to give consent to the change of the western terminus of said road as herein declared.

That is the sole object and purpose of the bill. The Senator from Kansas proposes to put upon this bill a section, general in its character with reference to all railroad grants where there is a change of route.

Mr. INGALLS. No, sir.

Mr. WRIGHT. I understand the amendment to provide expressly that, where there shall be a change of route, then the rule that he introduces shall be applicable to the rights of settlers.

Mr. INGALLS. It is confined exclusively to this act, by its terms. Let the amendment be again reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The Chief Clerk again read the amendment.

Mr. WRIGHT. I have no doubt that this amendment introduces a most pernicious rule; but as I am exceedingly anxious to get this bill out of the way before the expiration of the morning hour, I propose not to make any further resistance to the amendment as I understand it now, and let the bill go back to the House and be settled finally by subsequent proceedings.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to say one word in reference to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas. I do not think that amendment has any application whatever to this bill, although it may be a correct principle to adopt. The original act provided for land grants to two railways, one beginning at Sioux City and extending in a northeasterly direction to the city of Saint Paul, the other beginning on the Mississippi River and extending directly west on the line of the forty-third parallel; and the two were to meet in O'Brien County. When these two lines were made they did not meet in O'Brien County as a matter of fact, and the Sioux City and Saint Paul railway is completed. Their line is fixed. The other railroad is not completed. In order to make a crossing of that railway, as provided by the act of 1864, they are compelled in fact to cross west of O'Brien County or divert their line too far from the forty-third parallel or from a direct east-and-west line.

The bill as it stands now does not change the route of the McGregor Western Railway in any sense; therefore the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas does not affect, as I understand, the land granted in this act. It involves a new principle with reference to land grants, and in that respect it may be of value to him as a precedent applying to some other railways in Kansas or some other portion of the country. The amendment proposed by him will be quoted hereafter possibly as a precedent set by this Congress with reference to the rights of pre-emptors and homestead settlers. I do not know that it is wrong; I think it is right; it appears to me to be so, but it has no application to this bill, and I trust it will not be adopted without some previous examination by the Committee on Public Lands or other committee of the Senate.

Mr. WINDOM. If I understand the last clause of the amendment, I am opposed to it. I think it introduces a new principle entirely, and that is to allow parties who have received eighty acres under the homestead law to make up their deficiency anywhere else in the United States. I know of no case in which we have allowed that to be done. If we have allowed them to make up deficiencies at all, it has been within the limits of the grant to the road; but this gives them a wandering commission to go anywhere in the United States. I think it would be a very pernicious principle if we should adopt it. I may have misunderstood the amendment.

Mr. SARGENT. Is an amendment to the amendment in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. SARGENT. I propose the following amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas: After the words "United States," in the next to the last line of the amendment, I move to insert "within said State;" so as to read:

That settlers under the homestead laws who, by reason of such withdrawal and subsequent change, have received but eighty acres of land shall be entitled to eighty acres additional, to be selected from any of the public lands of the United States within said States, open to settlement or pre-emption, at the minimum price.

Mr. INGALLS. I accept the amendment. Does the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WRIGHT] object to the amendment as amended?

Mr. WRIGHT. I think the amendment is entirely out of place. I regard it as vicious in principle, as I understand it, as applied to such a bill as this. I therefore trust the amendment will be voted down and that we shall have the bill as reported by the committee.

Mr. INGALLS. I understood the Senator from Iowa to say that under the circumstances he was willing that the amendment should be made to the bill, and that, as amended, it might go to a committee of conference for further consideration; but, as he now asks the Senate to vote down my amendment and says that the principle involved is new and vicious and one that ought not to be adopted, I beg leave to submit a few remarks to the Senate in regard to what has been said by him and by his colleague.

The law under which this road was endowed was approved on the 12th of May, 1864. The second section of the act provides—

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the sections and parts of sections of land which by such grant shall remain to the United States within ten miles on each side of said roads shall not be sold for less than double the minimum price of public lands when sold, nor shall any of said lands become subject to sale at private entry until the same shall have been first offered at public sale to the highest bidder at or above the minimum price as aforesaid: Provided, That actual bona fide settlers under the pre-emption laws of the United States may, after due proof of settlement, improvement, and occupation, as now provided by law, purchase the same at the increased minimum price—

And that is at $2.50 per acre—

And provided also, That settlers under the provisions of the homestead law who comply with the terms and requirements of said act shall be entitled to patents for an amount not exceeding eighty acres each, anything in this act to the contrary notwithstanding.

Under this act, it is undoubtedly true that a large number of pre-emption settlers have taken land at $2.50 an acre. It is undoubtedly true that numerous homestead settlers have taken lands, have obtained a patent to but eighty acres, when, if they had been outside of these railroad limits, pre-emptors would have been compelled to pay but $1.25 an acre and homesteaders would have had one hundred and sixty acres of land. Now, the Senator from Iowa comes in and asks Congress to change the terminus and, therefore, the route of this road.

Mr. WRIGHT. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, sir.

Mr. WRIGHT. It is a matter of a great deal more importance to my people to have this bill through, even with this amendment upon it, than it is to have it delayed. I therefore ask that, unless there be some objection, the amendment be concurred in and let it go to the House and have it by a committee of conference settled. Let that be done unless there be some objection on the part of other Senators to the amendment.

Mr. INGALLS. That is all I desire, to have the amendment adopted.

Mr. WRIGHT. I want to have the bill disposed of, as it is a matter of vital importance to us locally that we shall have some work on this road the present year. We cannot without it.

Mr. WINDOM. I have no objection to the proposition with the amendment offered by the Senator from California, which has been agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That has been accepted. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas, as amended.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to insert after the word "grant," in line 17, "nor to give said railroads any claim upon the United States to be re-imbursed for lands which may have been pre-empted or purchased or occupied by settlers under the homestead acts of Congress.

Mr. WRIGHT. I have no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. U. S. GRANT, jr., his Secretary, announced that the President had on the 20th instant approved and signed the act (S. No. 842) authorizing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to remove the jail on Judiciary Square to grounds near the Washington Asylum for the use of the District.

JOHN E. CATLETT.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I move to take up Senate bill No. 807.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 807) for the relief of John E. Catlett, of Hannibal, Missouri, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to John E. Catlett, of Hannibal, Missouri, of $400, for money expended and services rendered in the detection, arrest, and conviction of Edward W. Wise, for manufacturing and passing counterfeit fractional currency.

The Committee on Claims proposed to amend the bill, in line 16, by reducing the amount appropriated from $400 to $300.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 4475) removing the political disabilities of Joel S. Kennard, of Savannah, Georgia;

A bill (H. R. No. 820) for the relief of the mission of Saint James, in Washington Territory; and

A bill (H. R. No 4476) to provide for the appointment of an official short-hand reporter for the United States courts in and for the district of California.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 4307) making appropriations to supply certain deficiencies in the contingent fund of the House of Representatives, and for other purposes; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

ALMON F. MILLS.

Mr. INGALLS. I ask consent to pass a few pension bills. I move to take up House bill No. 3038.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 3038) granting a pension to Almon F. Mills, late private Company K, Twenty-ninth Regiment Ohio Volunteers, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMASA J. FINCH.

Mr. INGALLS. I move the present consideration of Senate bill No. 1152.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 1152) granting a pension to Amasa J. Finch was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Secretary of the Interior is directed by the bill to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Amasa J. Finch, at the rate of $18.75 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THOMAS G. KINGSLEY.

Mr. INGALLS. I move the consideration of House bill No. 3511.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 3511) granting increased pension to Thomas G. Kingsley was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for an increase of pension to Thomas G. Kingsley, formerly colonel of the Twenty-sixth Connecticut Volunteers, equal to the special rate provided for the loss of both eyes or both feet or hands.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ELIZA A. BLAZE.

Mr. INGALLS. I move the present consideration of House bill No. 3575.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 3575) granting a pension to Eliza A. Blaze, widow of Abner T. Blaze, late a private in Company C, Thirteenth Indiana Cavalry Volunteers, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BENJAMIN AND D. W. FENTON.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I move the present consideration of Senate bill No. 855.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 855) making an appropriation to pay the claim of Benjamin Fenton and D. W. Fenton, was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It appropriates $958.32 in full payment, satisfaction, and discharge of the claim of Benjamin Fenton and D. W. Fenton, for rent of lot No. 59 of the Memphis navy-yard, in Memphis, Tennessee, while the same was occupied by the United States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the report read in that case.

The Secretary read the following report submitted by Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Claims, on the 20th of May, 1876:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Fenton & Brother, of Memphis, Tennessee, praying compensation for the use and occupation of lot No. 59 of the Memphis navy-yard from June 6, 1862, to August 20, 1866, submit the following report:

By an act of Congress approved August 15, 1854, the United States ceded all the grounds and appurtenances thereunto belonging, known as the Memphis navy-yard, in Shelby County, Tennessee, to the mayor and aldermen of the city of Memphis.

In the year 1857 the city of Memphis mortgaged the property to secure a debt of $350,000; and to raise the money to pay interest on said debt laid off the grounds into lots and leased it to various parties.

The property for which rent is demanded is known and designated as lot 59.

On the 17th day of January, 1857, lot 59 was leased by the city of Memphis to Charles Richmond for thirty years. On the 19th day of June, 1858, Richmond assigned the lease to Walt. C. Bradford. On the 1st day of October, 1859, Bradford assigned the lease to claimants.

Claimants entered into possession of the premises under their lease, and while occupying them were dispossessed by the United States authorities in June, 1862, and the occupation of the buildings for storage and hospital purposes was continued by United States authorities until the 30th day of September, 1868.

The entire navy-yard having been taken possession of by United States authorities soon after the occupation of the city of Memphis, repeated applications were made by the city of Memphis, through its solicitor and mayor, to the President, Secretary of War, and other officers of the Government, during the years 1866 and 1867, for the restoration of the property.

The Quartermaster-General, to whom the application was finally referred, reported that the property, having been used for the manufacture of arms and ammunition for the confederate military authorities, was captured by the United States and held for its use as a lawful prize of war.

Secretary Stanton transmitted all the papers to the Attorney-General in October, 1866, and requested his opinion as to whether the property should be considered as captured, and as to what disposition of the property should be made by the War Department under existing laws.

The Attorney-General returned the papers with the opinion that the case did not present any of the legal elements that constitute a case of capture, and that the property should be restored to the city.

By order of the Secretary of War the application for restoration was then referred to Major-General Thomas, with instructions to turn over the property to the city authorities, with an accompanying suggestion, that in consideration of the relinquishment of the property in question to the city, it might feel disposed to entertain favorably a proposition to relinquish all claims for back rent.

Upon this point, as well as upon that of providing quarters for troops then occupying the premises, General Thomas was instructed to obtain the best terms possible.

On the 3d day of September, 1868, General Swords leased from the mayor so much of the navy-yard grounds and buildings as would answer for the accommodation of the troops, and was informed by the mayor that he was not authorized to make any arrangement as to the back rent of the lessees.

It appears that claimants paid to the city of Memphis the rents and taxes on said property during the entire period of occupancy by the United States authorities, and made many applications during the years 1866-'67-'68 to different officers of the Government for the restoration thereof, and were refused on the ground that it was required by the Government as a military storehouse.

In reply to an application made by claimants during the summer of 1868, to Captain Parkinson, quartermaster at Memphis, for the restoration, they were advised by General Thomas that the Government would turn over the property only on condition that they (claimants) would relinquish all right to claim for rent and damages.

On the 18th day of August, 1868, Messrs. Wilson & Beard, attorneys for claimants, addressed a communication to Mr. W. B. Miller, of Louisville, Kentucky, authorizing him to say to General Thomas that if the Government relinquished claimants' property within the next month that their clients (Messrs. Fenton) would relinquish all claims against the Government for back rent.

The property was turned over to Fenton & Brother on the 30th day of September, 1868, who executed the following release:

"The building in the navy-yard having been turned over to us to-day, we, as lawful agents of Messrs. Fenton & Co., hereby relinquish all claims for back rent of said building on account of the use and occupancy of the same by the Government.

"WILSON & BEARD,
"Attorneys for Fenton & Brother."

The property for which rent is claimed does not appear to have been used in any manner to support the rebellion, but in the manufacture of cotton-seed oil, and was seized on account of adjoining property, belonging to the city, being used for the manufacture of arms and ammunition for the confederate authorities.

The title has not been divested out of the city of Memphis by any proceeding in court under the act of August 6, 1861; on the contrary, the property was all restored to the city during the year 1865, upon the advice of the Attorney-General.

The claimants applied to the Secretary of War for the payment of their claim for rent of said lot 59 from June 6, 1862, when it was first occupied by the United States, to September 30, 1868, on which last-mentioned day it was surrendered by the United States to the claimants. It was submitted by the Secretary of War to the proper accounting officer, the third auditor, who held that so much of the claim as originated prior to the 20th day of August, 1866, could not be considered by him, for the reason that the act which became a law on the 21st day of February, 1867, prohibited the settlement of claims growing out of the occupation of or injury to real estate, when such claims originated during the war of the rebellion, and in a State or part of a State which had been by the proclamation of the President dated July 1, 1862, declared to be in insurrection. But the accounting officer further held that claimants were entitled to a fair compensation for rent of lot from August 20, 1866, to the date of the surrender of the lot, September 30, 1868.

The Third Auditor held that the waiver by claimants of back rent, on condition of the surrender of possession, had no legal force. In this we concur. If there was any just reason why the property should not be given up, then it was wrong to give it up on such condition; but if it was just to give it up, the officers had no right to exact any burdensome condition, and any waiver made under such circumstances would be without consideration and of no legal effect.

The accounting officer having held that claimants were entitled to reasonable rent from August 20, 1866, (the date of the termination of the war as fixed by the Supreme Court of the United States,) to September 30, 1868, the date the premises were surrendered, the amount was fixed upon the report of Quartermaster Ekin at $2,500 per annum, and the claimants have accordingly been paid the sum of $5,271.78. The balance of the claim—that is, the claim for rent from June 6, 1862, to August 20, 1866—was rejected, and Congress is now asked to pay this rejected claim. Is the Government liable for this rejected claim?

Benjamin Fenton, one of the claimants, is now and during the late civil war was a resident of Memphis, and D. W. Fenton, the other claimant, was then and still is a resident of New York.

It is not claimed that the Government agreed with the claimants to make compensation for the use of the premises.

In the view which your committee takes of this claim it becomes important to inquire, "when did the rebellion begin and end?"

Acts of hostility by the insurgents occurred at periods so various and of such different degrees of importance and in parts of the country so remote from each other, both at the commencement and close of the late civil war, that it would be difficult, if not impossible, to say at what precise day it began or terminated. It is necessary, therefore, to refer to some public act of the political departments of the Government to fix the dates; and, for obvious reasons, those of the executive department, which may be and in fact was, at the commencement of hostilities, obliged to act during the recess of Congress, must be taken.

The Supreme Court, in the case of The Protector, (12 Wallace, 700,) holds that the proclamation of intended blockade by the President fixes and determines the date of the commencement of the war, and the proclamation that the war had closed fixes the date of the termination of the war. But the war did not begin or close at the same time in all the States. There were two proclamations of intended blockade: the first of the 19th of April, 1861; the second of April 27, 1861. The State of Tennessee was not embraced in either proclamation declaring a blockade. On the 16th of August, 1861, the President, by proclamation, declared the inhabitants of Tennessee and other States "in a state of insurrection against the United States." (12 Statutes at Large, 1262.) We think that the date of this proclamation may be deemed to fix the date of the commencement of the war in Tennessee. There were two proclamations declaring that the war had closed: one issued on the 2d of April, 1866, embracing the State of Tennessee and all the other insurgent States except Texas, and the other, issued on the 20th of August, 1866, embracing the State of Texas.

We will, then, as the Supreme Court has decided, take the dates of these proclamations as ascertaining the commencement and the close of the war in the States mentioned in them. Applying this rule to the claim we are now considering, we find that the war began in Tennessee August 16, 1861, and ended on the 2d day of April, 1866.

We do not rely upon the said act of February 21, 1867, herein referred to.

The laws governing the case may be stated as follows, that is to say, where an army occupies and garrisons a town in an enemy's country in time of war the occupation of such buildings as are necessary to the use of the army and those depending upon them, with all the costs and damages, is an incident of war for which the Government is in no sense responsible. An army cannot hold a city without occupying some portion of it; and if they do so, that is one of the incidents of war, and gives no contract, expressed or implied, against the government of the occupying army.

We adhere to the rule laid down by this committee in the case of James Glover, reported ——— ——, 1876, and hold that, in law, during a state of war, it makes no difference whether the owners of this property were loyal or disloyal, nor whether they resided in a loyal or in an insurgent State—that the situs of the property governs.

The claimants have been paid for rent of the premises since August 20, 1866, on the assumption that the war ended on that day. We have seen that the Supreme Court, in the case of The Protector, 12 Wallace, 700, held that the war terminated in Tennessee on the 2d of April, 1866.

We think claimants are entitled to be paid rent from April 2, 1866, the date of the end of the war in Tennessee, to August 20, 1866, at the rate of $2,500 per annum.

We therefore herewith report a bill appropriating the sum of $958.32 in full payment and satisfaction of the claimants' said claim, and we recommend that the same do pass.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is that report made by the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Yes, sir. The bill simply provides for the payment of rent from the 2d of April, 1866, to the 20th of August, 1866, during which time the property was in the actual occupation of the United States, as the Supreme Court has held that the war terminated in Tennessee on the 2d of April, 1866. We reject the claim for rent during the war, and only allow rent during the time the property was in fact occupied after the cessation of the war in the State of Tennessee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Was possession demanded before that time?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Yes, sir.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COUNTING OF THE ELECTORAL VOTES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired. The unfinished business is the bill (S. No. 1153) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877, which is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, as the member of the committee who did not agree to this bill, I have thought it proper that I should make a brief statement of the grounds on which I did not concur with my colleagues; but I am not well this morning and am unable to speak as I should desire. Still, as the bill is about to come to a vote apparently, I will very briefly state the reasons why I could not give my assent to its being reported.

This bill is presented for the consideration of Congress under very peculiar circumstances. The Congress of the United States is scarcely left free for its consideration. We are aware that there is great uneasiness in the public mind throughout the country; apprehensions are entertained of violence, of revolutionary action on the part of the House of Representatives, of some course being taken that may result in disturbing the peace of the country. A member of Congress has said in a speech in this city that 100,000 men would be here on the 14th of February to witness the counting of the votes. That may be regarded as an extravagant utterance; but it is one of very many of the kind that come up to us from different parts of the country; so that the business interests of the country have become alarmed, and there is a disposition to take almost any measure that may be proposed that will give assurance of peace without very much regard to the character of the measure.

I do not think I am at all out of the way when I say that this bill is a literal product of "the Mississippi plan;" that the shadow of intimidation has entered this Chamber, and that in proposing this bill, and in the consideration of it, members of the Senate and of the House are acting under the apprehension of violence, of some great revolutionary act that will threaten the safety and continuance of our institutions. I do not myself believe in the reality of this danger. I believe that this sort of talk is intended for a purpose, and I very much fear that it will accomplish that purpose. The real danger that we are in results from weakness, results from timidity, results from not daring to stand up to do our whole duty as we understand it.

It is said by geologists that there was a period in the history of the earth's crust when there were skull-less vertebrates; and it would seem now that we have come to that period when there are vertebrateless skulls. The thing to do is to do what is right, and to do it fearlessly. For one, I am not afraid that, if this vote shall be counted as it was for the first seventy-two years in the history of our Government, there will be any revolution; I believe that any one who attempts it will be utterly destroyed.

I regard this bill, Mr. President, as a compromise. It will take its place alongside of the compromise of 1820, and the compromise of 1850. By the compromise of 1820, all the territory south of 36° 30′ was given over to slavery; and, when the time came to settle the territory north of that line, the compromise was destroyed. By the compromise of 1850 the institution of slavery got the immediate benefit of the fugitive-slave law, which gave it such prestige, power, and confidence as made it aspire to the complete conquest of the country.

I believe that Rutherford B. Hayes has been elected President of the United States; he has been elected under the forms of law and according to law, and that he is elected in the hearts of the people; and I believe that if he should be counted in, as eighteen Presidents were successively counted in from the beginning of this Government, he would be inaugurated and there would be no violence and no revolution.

There have been upon this question a great many loose opinions given from time to time on the first impression, without examination, and perhaps most Senators have indulged in them, so that very few can entirely claim to be consistent. I have indulged in them myself. But within the last few weeks this question has been presented as a case in hand, not simply as a matter speculative, something to come in the future; and there has been a flood of light poured upon it such as had never been before; many new things have been discovered, many things have been said, and we have the counsel of the best legal minds all over the country.

I brought forward a bill some two years ago, which was afterward reported by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, for the purpose of having a law for the counting of the electoral vote. I did not claim that that bill was perfect. It was not in view of any contingency or case. It, however, was in one respect a safe bill, and that is, leaving out of view who should count the vote, whether the President of the Senate or the two Houses, it contained no word by which the two Houses could be authorized to go behind the returns of a State, to go behind the decision made by the returning officers of the State appointed by the State for that purpose; and the bill of 1800, if I remember correctly, expressly provided that the two Houses should not go behind the returns so far as to count the votes for electors. I am not an advocate for State sovereignty; I never have been; but I have been a consistent advocate of State rights as I am now. The Constitution of the United States confers upon the States the power to appoint electors in such way as the Legislatures of the States may prescribe. This is the absolute right of each State. The mode of appointment is left to the Legislature of the State. The determination as to who have been appointed is left entirely to the State.

Should Congress assume to determine who have been appointed so far as to go behind the action of the officers of the State appointed by the laws of the State for that purpose, Congress would absorb to itself the entire power, would become a grand returning board, without limit and without restraint. The very moment we undertake to go behind the determination of the officers of the State as to the result of a State election and to count and determine the result for ourselves, that moment we establish a revolution which ultimately will be the end of presidential elections. I am not now referring to the certificate of the governor, which is prescribed not by State laws but prescribed by the act of Congress; but I am referring to that determination of the result of elections as prescribed by the laws of the States. The States have the right to appoint electors; the Legislature has the right to prescribe the method; and the evidence as to the appointment, as to who has been appointed, is left to the States as absolutely and as completely as the appointment itself.

I listened to the very able speech of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] on Saturday last with great interest. If I understood him correctly he assumed that there was no provision of the Constitution that executes itself except one, and that is in regard to the recovery of fugitives from labor, fugitive slaves; that the rest of the provisions of the Constitution are not self-executing, but require legislation to carry them into operation. He made a distinction, I believe, which is correct, that there are two classes of powers conferred by the Constitution. Where a power is conferred directly upon any department of the Government by the Constitution, that power cannot be taken from that department; that power cannot be delegated; but where the Constitution simply imposes a duty, but does not vest any particular department with the performance of that duty, then Congress may by law determine who shall discharge that duty.

If I understood the Senator aright, he took the ground that the counting of the votes was a duty imposed by the Constitution, but that the Constitution had not located it, had not said who should do it. He denied that the duty was imposed upon the President of the Senate. He said the President of the Senate was directed to open all the certificates, but he was not directed to count them. He was directed to open them "and the votes shall then be counted." The power and duty to count were not located in the two Houses; the Constitution did not say that any more than it said the President of the Senate should count them. It said the votes should then be counted. Assuming, for the sake of the argument, his position to be true that there is nothing in the Constitution, any part of it, that indicates that the President of the Senate shall count the votes as well as open them; assuming it to be true that the Constitution simply imposes a duty to count the votes, but does not say by whom the duty shall be performed, and therefore that Congress is left free to impose the performance of that duty upon a commission and upon any person it sees proper to put in that situation, his position would be tenable. The Senator in applying that to this case made use of the following language:

> But, as I have said, I only intended on this occasion to explain in as brief a way as I could exactly what the bill is and in a general way the grounds upon which it rests. The illustrations that might be still further made to show that this deciding power of which I am speaking does not rest with you, and as I think to show equally that it does not rest with either House of Congress until Congress provides a law that allows it to rest there, are so numerous that the whole day might be spent upon them.

The position of the Senator is that the Constitution created the duty to count the votes, but did not locate the power or duty anywhere, and that Congress, under the general power to pass all laws necessary and proper to carry into execution the powers given to any department or to the Government of the United States, may by law devolve that duty upon a commission or upon any person. If I do not state his position correctly, I hope he will correct me.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, if the Senator wishes me to correct him now, he states a part of my position correctly, but he only states half of it; but I will take the opportunity to correct him, so as not to disturb him, afterward.

Mr. MORTON. Well, Mr. President, I am stating the Senator's position correctly and fully as I understand it, and I understand this position of his to be necessary to another part of his argument, because if the power to count the votes, which I believe he expressly disclaims, is lodged in the two Houses by the Constitution and is not a general power to be executed by law, then this power must be exercised by the two Houses only and cannot be delegated; whereas if it is simply a duty imposed to count the vote then Congress may locate that duty wherever it sees proper by law. The position of the Senator is that neither the President of the Senate is vested with this power nor are the two Houses of Congress, that neither can exercise it in the absence of a law passed for that purpose; and this brings us then to a very great fact which is that for eighty-four years Presidents were counted in and inaugurated without any authority in point of law by any person. The President of the Senate had no power to do it because there was no law authorizing him to do it. The two Houses had no power to do it because there was no law authorizing them to do it. It was a part of the Constitution which had not been carried into operation by legislation. Now, sir, is it true that for eighty-four years Presidents were counted in and inaugurated without authority of law? That would be a very great discovery if it were true. It would show that the men who made the Constitution did not understand it. I believe that they thought the first President and all succeeding Presidents were counted in and inaugurated according to law. They may have been mistaken. Their opportunities for knowing what the Constitution is were not so good as ours, I suppose. They undoubtedly believed that the votes were properly counted for George Washington, John Adams, Thomas Jefferson, and so on.

I believe that this power is vested somewhere, located somewhere, that if it does not belong to the President of the Senate it belongs to the two Houses. It is in one place or the other. But whatever may be the location, in theory, that the two Houses cannot exercise this power without legislation I think is correct. I think the Senator from Vermont occupies a sound position in that respect; and whatever we may say about the power of Congress to legislate, and conceding that, as I have done heretofore and have presented bills to this Chamber upon that hypothesis heretofore, yet that in the absence of legislation the President of the Senate must count the votes, that this results not from any theory but results from necessity to prevent a dead lock, to prevent the Government from coming to a stand-still, that until legislation has been had under which the vote can be counted by the two Houses or providing some tribunal for it the President of the Senate must count the vote, and the vote was counted for seventy-two years upon that theory. If that theory was not correct, then it was unlawfully counted without authority and for three quarters of a century this Government proceeded illegally. Chancellor Kent stated the law on this subject as I think it has been generally understood in Congress and out of it until very recently:

> The President of the Senate, on the second Wednesday in February succeeding every meeting of the electors, in the presence of both Houses of Congress, opens all the certificates, and the votes are then to be counted. The Constitution does not expressly declare by whom the votes are to be counted and the result declared. In the case of questionable votes, and a closely contested election, this power may be all important; and I presume, in the absence of all legislative provision on the subject, that the President of the Senate counts the votes, and determines the result, and that the two Houses are present only as spectators, to witness the fairness and accuracy of the transaction, and to act only if no choice be made by the electors.

Now, conceding as Chancellor Kent seems to do, that there may be legislation on the subject, a doctrine to which I have subscribed, yet in the absence of legislation the President of the Senate must count the votes to prevent the Government coming to a halt, and he has counted the votes for eighty-four years, at least for seventy-two, from 1789 until the time of the adoption of the twenty-second joint rule. I do not intend now to go into an argument as to the right of the President of the Senate to count this vote against the powers of Congress. I am simply stating what I have heretofore understood to be the general doctrine, that in the absence of legislation the President of the Senate must count this vote; that if now we fail to agree upon a bill we should simply leave this question where it has been left for eighty-four years; and that the President of the Senate in counting this vote would be guilty of no greater usurpation than he has been guilty of for three-quarters of a century.

We are discussing this bill in the presence of a case. We are discussing it in the presence of an actual condition of things. I shall be anxious to have a fair bill adopted. I was exceedingly anxious to agree with the committee in the recommendation of a fair proposition; but when we are preparing a bill in the presence of a case made up, ready to be tried, the papers all signed and in due order, I insist that it shall be a fair bill under which the condition of things shall not be unfairly changed.

As I said before I believe Rutherford B. Hayes is elected President, elected upon the papers, elected under every form of law; that he ought to be inaugurated, and that he must be inaugurated unless a bill shall be passed which shall allow him to be counted out in defiance of the well-settled principles of law. I am not well enough, Mr. President, to go into this question to-day as I should like to do.

I wish to say a few words in regard to this bill. If the power to count this vote is vested in the two Houses, and is not in the President of the Senate, then the duty must be performed by the two Houses: it cannot be delegated. This was the precise point, as I understood it, of the argument of the Senator from Vermont, because, if he were to admit that the power is vested in the two Houses under the Constitution, he would be compelled to admit, good lawyer as he is, that that power cannot be delegated; but by placing it as a floating power, that is located nowhere until it is located by an act of Congress, then Congress would have the right to deposit this power with a commission.

The commission created is a mixed commission, partly inside and partly outside, five Senators, five Representatives, and five judges. The judges are taken, not because they are judges, not because they are members of the Supreme Court, but because they are men of eminent character who happen to occupy that position. Four of them are chosen by circuits. The Senator from Vermont hardly did himself justice on Saturday when he argued that they were chosen by circuits on account of geographical distribution. They were chosen by circuits, as I understand it, not because of geographical distribution, but because of the political antecedents of the men who preside in those circuits. When the bill, instead of naming the judges, names the circuits, it presents a harmless little sham that deceives nobody.

Four judges are taken by the bill because of their political antecedents, two on each side. In other words, the four judges are selected upon political grounds, equally divided, it is said, in order to make the bill a fair one. Nevertheless, selection is made in the Supreme Court on political grounds. If we are to deal with the Supreme Court—and I confess I looked upon that proposition with more favor than the other—I thought we ought to have taken the whole court, and not admit by any form of provision that we believed politics entered into the court; not divide it up on political grounds; not assume that the duties of that court are liable to be influenced by their political prepossessions, but take the whole court as a court. I thought that the least objectionable. It is true the other day, when there was a constitutional amendment here referring this matter to the Supreme Court, I voted against it; but I did so chiefly because it re-enacted the electoral college and re-enacted an election of President by the House of Representatives by States. But if we are to take an outside tribunal it seemed to me to be far better that we should take the court and take it as a court, take all the judges, and not pick around among them to get an equal number on political grounds. I thought that was a blow at the court and would do it more injury than any course that could be taken. They are to take a fifth. Four judges are to select a fifth.

Here is a very grave question presented, right at the threshold: What is the character of these commissioners? Are they officers? They are sworn; the very highest duty is imposed upon them, the decision of the greatest case that can arise under our institutions. If they are officers, are they not to be appointed as other officers under the Constitution of the United States are appointed? Can we take four men by name and authorize them to appoint the fifth and submit to this court thus organized this great case? Is it not a court to all intents and purposes? You call it a commission, but names are nothing. It is a court invested with the very highest jurisdiction to decide both law and fact, expressly charged with deciding the question, What are the powers of each or of both Houses of Congress? and expressly charged with finding the fact as to who have been elected electors for President of the United States. If it is a court, should it not be appointed as the Constitution requires other courts to be, and if these men are public officers, should they not be appointed as officers of the United States are required to be appointed? This is a contrivance, to use the very mildest words, a contrivance, a patched-up thing, five Representatives, five Senators, four judges first, and they to choose a fifth, and thus this tribunal is to be created that is to make a President of the United States. There are no analogies for it in our Constitution or in our laws or in our history. We have no tribunals made up in that way.

If we were to make this tribunal exclusively in the two Houses, make it consist of Representatives and Senators entirely, and stop there, the question would then arise, can we do it? If the decision of this question belongs to the two Houses, can you leave it to a few members of these two Houses and agree to be bound by their decision? Can you pass a law in that way? Can you by joint resolution or by bill authorize a conference committee to pass a law and to make it binding unless it is reversed by a majority of both Houses. Committees are but facilities of Congress, and their action amounts to nothing unless ratified by Congress. The decision of a conference committee amounts to nothing in point of law until after both Houses shall have confirmed its action; but here you create a commission partly of Senators, partly of Members, and partly of the judges of the Supreme Court, and you provide that the finding of that commission shall be valid unless reversed by a majority of both Houses. Here is a clear delegation of power. If it were provided that the finding of that commission should not be valid until confirmed by both Houses of Congress, there would be no delegation of power. You could just as well provide that it shall be binding unless reversed by two-thirds of each House, or you could provide that it should be absolutely binding and that there shall be no appeal at all. Here you create a court and you give an appeal from this court not to a higher court known to the Constitution of the United States, but you give an appeal to the Congress of the United States, provided that if the appeal shall be sustained by both Houses concurrently the decision of the court below shall be reversed. I will say one word further in regard to the bill.

It is a fundamental principle of law, in connection with the election of a President, in preserving and defining the rights of the States, that the action of the States shall be received unquestioned by the Congress of the United States, or by that power, whatever it may be, that shall count the vote; and any authority conferred upon this commission, or that might be conferred by an act of Congress upon the President of the Senate or any other agency selected to go behind the returning board of a State and count the votes, would be, in my judgment, a gross violation of the spirit and letter of the Constitution, revolution, and the end of presidential elections under our system.

I wish briefly to call the attention of the members of the Senate to this bill. I speak of the jurisdictional part, that part conferring jurisdiction upon this commission, and it is the vital part of the bill. We need not deceive ourselves for a moment about this business. We know that both parties are looking intently to that question and at that particular point. We may affect to be oblivious of it here, but we understand that the decision of this presidential question depends absolutely upon that question, for if the principle shall stand that the action of the State authorities, those that are appointed to count the votes and to say by State laws who are elected, Rutherford B. Hayes is elected and Mr. Tilden cannot be counted in except by overturning that principle. It is all in that, and the able lawyers of the democratic party on this floor and everywhere understand that just as well as we do. I call attention to that part of this bill which gives the jurisdiction to this tribunal:

Every objection shall be made in writing, and shall state clearly and concisely, and without argument, the ground thereof, and shall be signed by at least one Senator and one Member of the House of Representatives before the same shall be received. When all such objections so made to any certificate, vote, or paper from a State shall have been received and read, all such certificates, votes, and papers so objected to, and all papers accompanying the same, together with such objections, shall be forthwith submitted to said commission, which shall proceed to consider the same, with the same powers, if any, now possessed for that purpose by the two Houses acting separately or together—

I may here remark that the bill proceeds upon a theory different from that of the Senator from Vermont in his argument. He assumes that the Constitution does not locate this power anywhere, but that it is to be located by law, while this bill goes upon the hypothesis that this power is located in the two Houses and that this commission shall have what the two Houses have, more or less—which shall proceed to consider the same, with the same powers, if any, now possessed for that purpose by the two Houses acting separately or together, and, by a majority of votes, decide whether any and what votes from such State are the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States, and how many and what persons were duly appointed electors in such State, and may therein take into view such petitions, depositions, and other papers, if any, as shall, by the Constitution and now existing law, be competent and pertinent in such consideration.

First, they are required to find what were the constitutional votes of a State. They are required to do a thing there which in my opinion the Constitution does not authorize, whether the power to count the votes be vested in the President of the Senate or in the two Houses. They are required to find, for example, under that provision whether the electors were eligible or ineligible as to their qualifications, while I maintain there is no time or place under the Constitution when the votes are counted for an inquiry of that kind. The duty is short and simple. The President of the Senate shall open the certificates in the presence of the two Houses and the votes shall then be counted. There is but one thing to do and that is to count the votes. There is no time, there is no place to try the question of the eligibility of the electors.

Suppose it should be said, if you please, that the President himself, the candidate, is not a citizen of the United States; that he is not eligible to be elected, and that that charge should be made when the votes are counted. The candidate takes issue; he says he is a citizen; was born in this country, or he says he is thirty-five years old. That may be denied. An issue of fact arises. Can you try that issue then? Will you count him out because you say he is not thirty-five years old when he says he is? You cannot try that question of fact then. Will you count him out because it is said he was not born in the United States? He says that he was; that there are those living who were present and can prove it. If that issue is made you cannot possibly try it at that time. And so with regard to electors. If they suggest that an elector was not eligible, that he was postmaster, if you please, he may deny the fact; he may insist that he had resigned before that time, and his resignation had been accepted. Is there any time or place there to try the issue of fact, whether he was eligible or not; whether he was postmaster or not; whether he was qualified or not to become an elector? No, Mr. President, whoever may count the votes, there is no time or place when you count the votes to try that question.

The two Houses are to come together. The President of the Senate is to open all the certificates. That does not mean every kind of certificate that may be placed in his possession. It does not mean any paper that may purport to be a certificate, but he is to open all the certificates from the electors of the several States and the votes shall then be counted, the votes in those certificates, be they good, bad, or indifferent, be they for an alien, or be they for a citizen of the United States. At that time and at that place there is but one thing to do, and that is to count the votes. It may be said that the candidate is not qualified to be elected; it may be said that the elector was not qualified to be an elector, but you cannot try that issue of fact then and there; there is but one thing to do, that is to count the votes. The President of the Senate has his duty, and that is to open the certificate that comes from the electors of the States. He is not bound to open certificates from pretended authority, from outsiders, from persons unknown officially. I am going on a little further, Mr. President.

This bill requires this commission to find the facts, whether these electors were duly appointed. We will just put the word "elected" instead of "appointed," for in this connection it means the same thing. They are required to find were these electors duly appointed? They are not required to find whether they have been duly certified by the State authorities as having been elected. No, sir; but they are required to find the fact were they duly appointed or elected? If it had said that this commission shall find how many electors there were, and whether they were duly certified as having been elected by the State authorities or the returning board created for that purpose, we could understand that; but they are required to find the fact as to who was elected, and thus, as I apprehend this bill, they are required to go behind the returns from the States. If it was intended that they should find who had been certified by the States as having been appointed or elected, that would be simple and easily understood; but the bill quietly and innocently requires the commission to find the fact as to who was duly elected. Then it provides that for that purpose they—

May therein take into view such petitions, depositions, and other papers, if any, as shall, by the Constitution and now existing law, be competent and pertinent in such consideration.

In finding the fact as to who was duly elected, they are authorized to take into consideration petitions, unsworn evidence, depositions, papers of all kinds, reports, everything that may be put in for the information of Congress. If these things are not to be considered in determining who has been elected, then the reference is useless. If this commission is to be controlled by the State authorities, by those who have been certified as elected by the returning officers of the several States, then they have no occasion to look at these petitions, memorials, and reports. The bill invites them to look at these papers, invites them for a purpose, and there can be no use in looking at them if the other principle of law is to be observed, that they are to be governed by the returns made by the officers of the several States.

Now, Mr. President, I think I do the intelligence of these distinguished democratic Senators but justice when I say that they would not go for this bill except that it gave them a chance for the only thing that can count Mr. Tilden in, and that is, to go behind the returns. Outside of that he has no chance, no possible hope; and that these distinguished and eminent lawyers go for a bill which at the very beginning cuts off and shuts out this their only hope, I must be excused for saying that I do not believe it.

Mr. President, I am not able to proceed any further to-day.

SWEARING IN OF A SENATOR.

Mr. HAMLIN. I ask the Senate to suspend its action upon the bill for a moment that the oath of office may be administered to my colleague-elect [Mr. BLAINE] whose credentials I a few days ago presented for the term he has lately been filling under executive appointment. He was not in his seat in the morning hour, but is now present and ready to take the oath of office.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator-elect from Maine will please present himself to be sworn.

Mr. BLAINE advanced to the desk, and the oaths prescribed by law having been administered to him, he took his seat in the Senate.

COUNTING OF THE ELECTORAL VOTES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1153) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, may I ask the attention of the Senate while as briefly as possible I give some of my views on the subject involved in the pending bill?

Appointed as one of the committee in reference to counting the electoral vote and having to the best of my ability discharged that responsible duty, I feel an obligation not to remain entirely silent.

While many of the reflecting and patriotic people of this country are interested, yes, deeply interested in several matters growing out of this subject, I believe there is one consideration with them which is paramount to all others. They are interested that their respective candidates for the Presidency shall be successful. They are interested that the true dignity and proper deportment of the Republic in the exercise of its elective franchise shall be maintained. They are interested that no precedent shall now be set which in each recurring election shall lead the lust of power to resort to force and fraud to attain its ends. They are interested that the peace of society shall not be disturbed. But paramount to all these considerations is their intense anxiety that the Senate and House of Representatives—the great Legislature of the nation—rising above all party and selfish considerations, shall at this critical period do exactly right.

This legislative body is the controlling Government of the country. It fixes its policy; it shapes its destinies. Legislation for the right may be denounced when it conflicts with partisan zeal or interests, and its promoters may be ostracized; but right, like

> Truth crushed to earth shall rise again:
> The eternal years of God are hers;
> But Error, wounded, writhes with pain,
> And dies among his worshipers.

It is not necessarily that party that secures the Presidency, not that party which secures a political triumph, but it is that party which is most devoted to the right and to the truest interests of the country that is now to be victorious.

Mr. President, the earliest commentators on the Constitution predicted that our greatest peril would be in the succession of the Presidency, and it seems as if every conceivable circumstance had combined to enhance that peril. The momentous question, whether the Administration, with its vast patronage reaching to every village in the land, is to change hands is to be decided by one vote out of 369—185 to 184. The currents of party feeling are strong, dashing against the foundations of our institutions, and the waters are bitter. The people have but recently ingrafted colored suffrage on our Constitution, and many men of influence are in heart opposed to the provision, and extremely, unreasonably, and unjustly reluctant that that vote shall determine the Presidency. States that are believed to have a large political majority for one party have sent returns in favor of the other. In four States double returns have been sent to the President of the Senate by persons who claim to represent the true government of the respective States. Honest men of each of the two great parties believe that they are about to be defrauded out of their rights, while myriads of office-holders and office-seekers strive to intensify the excited feeling. And amid all this complication the law—such a condition of affairs not having been contemplated—is undefined, yes, is chaotic, and what is still worse at such a time, the political majority in one House differs from that in the other.

It may be that it would be heroic statesmanship for the one party to claim that the power to count the vote is with the President of the Senate and for the other party to claim that the approval of both Houses of Congress must be had before a vote shall be counted, but I do not think so. I do not think so, first, because neither proposition in my opinion is true, and because, assuming that antagonistic position necessarily brings discredit and dishonor on the Republic. If there ever was a time when the representatives of the people should rise above passion, and prejudice, and party feeling, and with true courage and patriotism avert the threatened evil to our country, this is that time. The duties of a faithful Senator are always responsible, but in confronting this question we touch the point of the highest duty.

Events of interest, opportunities for usefulness frequently occur to public men, but it is seldom that they have an opportunity in a time of marked political hazard of promoting a measure so calculated in my opinion to check a disastrous current of events and to give a new and happy turn to public affairs. We must at all events, sir, do our duty if we can discover it, even though it be at a personal sacrifice.

Mr. Justice Story, in speaking of the Senate, uses this language:

> There are particular moments in public affairs when the people, stimulated by some irregular passion or some illicit advantage, or misled by the artful representations of intrusted men, may call for measures which they themselves will afterwards be most ready to lament and condemn. In these critical moments how salutary will be the interference of a body of respectable citizens, chosen without reference to the exciting cause, to check the misguided course of public opinion and to suspend the blow until reason, justice, and truth can regain their authority over the public mind.

Sir, I believe that the complication which now seems somewhat to imperil the quiet propriety of the Government will be adjusted by Congress and accepted by the people. And then our nation—its energies and conscious strength having been developed by the war; its habits of frugality and economy having been inculcated and fixed by the recent financial depression; the capability of the people for self-government and the stability of our institutions having been demonstrated by a quiet and peaceful solution of existing embarrassments—then our nation will enter upon a career of progress and prosperity that has in history few parallels.

And now, sir, let me call the attention of the Senate to what, in my opinion, is the present condition of the law relative to counting the electoral vote. It is essential that we know what the existing law is before we can determine whether remedial legislation is required.

Mr. President, this measure seems to meet with more opposition from republicans than from democrats. My opinion is that I am a republican, and while I would seek no unfair advantage over the opposing party, I would be the last man to sacrifice in the slightest degree the interests of that party of liberty which has so bravely and so grandly stood by the nation in its hour of peril. Some republicans say with emphasis that we must stand by the constitutional method of counting the vote, and that they will agree to nothing else. That is right, sir.

What is the constitutional method of counting the vote? From 1865 to 1875, ten years, when both Houses were republican, the method, I do not say the constitutional method, of counting the vote was this: When the vote of a State was called, if it was objected to, the two Houses separated, and if they both agreed, the vote was counted; but if they differed the vote was not counted. Either House could reject it. By a bill which passed the republican Senate last session by a large vote, but did not reach the House, we have an enactment in these words:

> That if more than one return shall be received by the President of the Senate from a State, purporting to be the certificates of electoral votes given at the last preceding election for President and Vice-President in such State, all such returns shall be opened by him in the presence of the two Houses when assembled to count the votes; and that return, and that only from such State shall be counted which the two Houses acting separately shall decide to be the true and valid return.

When that bill was before the Senate, knowing that it was our constitutional duty to give effect to and not to suppress the will of the people, I was extremely anxious to have an amendment adopted which should provide that where the two Houses disagreed as to counting the vote of a State it should be referred to the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House, and the Chief-Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States to decide which of the two votes should be received. Twenty republican Senators voted with me, but the amendment was lost. The measure now before us carries out the principle of that amendment. Instead of the subject being referred to the President of the Senate, it is referred to five Senators; instead of to the Speaker of the House, it is to five Representatives; instead of to the Chief-Justice, it is to five justices of the Supreme Court. I thought the amendment necessary for the good of the country before the election, and the election, I assure you, has not changed my opinion.

Mr. President, those who object to this measure I think will see at once that under the practice of the republican Senate and House for ten years, or under the bill that passed the Senate at the last session, there would be a sorry prospect of having the House agree that the vote of Louisiana, Florida, or South Carolina should be counted; and if they were rejected, the Senate very possibly might retaliate as to other States and thus the will of the people, whatever that will may be found on investigation to be, would be entirely defeated.

I agree that the method practiced by the two Houses for ten years, and provided for in the bill as it passed the Senate last year, is not the constitutional method of counting the vote; but with these precedents against the republican party, amounting well-nigh to an estoppel, I think it but just to say that the democracy of Congress have acted with entire fairness in agreeing that where there is but a single return from a State the vote shall be counted unless both Houses reject it, and in joining with us in establishing a tribunal so just and equal that the veriest caviler cannot point out in it any inequality, which tribunal shall decide in case there is a double return from a State which of the two shall be counted, subject to the right of both Houses still to reject the return that has thus been decided to be the true one.

But, sir, it is insisted that the constitutional method is for the President of the Senate to count the votes. That position we will consider presently, remarking here that if the power to count the votes is by the Constitution either expressly or impliedly reposed in the President of the Senate, it is a little difficult to understand how so many of us have under our oaths for ten years, and most emphatically at the last session, declared that the power under the Constitution was not with the President of the Senate; for how could we have conferred that power upon the two Houses of Congress if the Constitution reposed it with the President of the Senate?

By whom under the law as it stands is the electoral vote for President and Vice-President to be counted? The familiar provision of the Constitution is that the electors of the several States—

> Shall make distinct lists of all persons voted for as President, and of all persons voted for as Vice-President, and of the number of votes for each; which lists they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the seat of Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate. The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted.

In answer to the question who is to count the votes? I reply that if the controlling word in the short sentence "and the votes shall then be counted," is the word "counted," and if that word "counted" is taken to mean only enumeration or arithmetical computation, the votes are to be and may be said always to have been counted by the President of the Senate. The votes are under the Constitution in his custody. As a matter of practice, since the origin of the Government, he has handed the votes to tellers of the Senate and of the House in the presence of the two Houses. The tellers made the tally, the list, and then handed the result to the President of the Senate, and he has announced it. Although the computation of votes is in fact made by the tellers I call this process (using the word "count" as simply meaning enumeration) a counting by the President of the Senate, for the reason that for a long period after the origin of our Government, for some thirty-six years, the President of the Senate, as directed by the joint resolution of the two Houses, made and signed a certificate which was transmitted to the President of the United States and by him sent to the person who had been elected; and such certificates termed this process I have described a counting by the President of the Senate. The form of the certificate is this:

> Be it known that the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, being convened in the city of Philadelphia on the second Wednesday of February, in the year of our Lord 1797, the undersigned, Vice-President of the United States and President of the Senate, did, in the presence of said Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and count all the votes of the electors for a President and Vice-President, by which it appears that Thomas Jefferson, esq., was duly elected, agreeably to the Constitution, Vice-President of the United States of America.

And, sir, the practice of simply counting the votes has not been changed; and I take it that, using the word "counted" to mean "enumerated," none will dispute that the President of the Senate counts the votes; but in the short sentence "and the votes shall then be counted" there is another more important word even than "counted;" it is the word "votes;" votes are to be counted. Who is to adjudicate what are votes? is the question at issue. The measure before us provides that if there is one return from a State, it shall be counted, unless both Houses reject it; and where there are two returns the vote shall not, as heretofore, be lost by either House so declaring, but that it shall be referred to a fair commission, to advise which is the true vote, and that the vote which it says is the true one shall stand in the same position as does the vote of a State from which there is but a single return to be counted, unless both Houses reject it.

If it be true that this power of adjudicating what is a vote to be counted is by the Constitution reposed in the President of the Senate, the bill under consideration is of course unconstitutional. But it would be a wonderful power to repose in one man. Suppose that during the recent war the President of the Senate had said, "I hold that the Union cannot be dissolved, and I therefore recognize as true votes those returned from the Southern States," is it true that under the Constitution the Senate and the Representatives of the people must quietly have witnessed that proceeding? Or if, by a few more political changes or by some casualty between this and the second Wednesday in February, this Senate should change its political character and then elect a new President in political accord with it, is it true that he should have the power to reject Louisiana, Florida, and South Carolina, and to admit Oregon? I think not. The word "counted" clearly signifies adjudicated as well as enumerated.

What we seek to know is: first, who is to determine, when there is only one return from a State and that is objected to, whether it shall be counted, or if the President of the Senate or if one House so decides, or whether the return must have the approval of both Houses. Secondly, we seek to know, under existing laws, if the House says one certificate and the Senate says the other certificate is the true one, how is the question which vote shall be counted to be decided or is the vote to be lost? I will never agree to any provision by which the vote of a State is lost, for in this chaos of law there is one thing certain, one duty clearly imposed by the Constitution. It says that "the vote shall be counted." We are under obligation to ascertain which is the true vote and are derelict if we do not legislate to that end.

But, Mr. President, before undertaking to give more fully my views as to who shall decide what are votes to be counted, it is important to consider the limit and range of questions to be decided. If the Constitution reposes the duty of determining what are votes to be counted in the President of the Senate, he has no greater power than Congress would have if the duty was reposed there, and the commission provided for by the pending bill would have a more restricted power than Congress, for by the provisions of the bill the commission has no jurisdiction where there is not a double return. When that is the case the commission has, in the language of the bill, "the same powers, if any, now possessed for that purpose by the two Houses of Congress acting separately or together." If then we ascertain the limits of the power of Congress in adjudicating what are votes to be counted, if the power is with it, we have the limit to the power, by whomsoever it is to be exercised.

I submit, sir, that if the power is with Congress to determine what are votes to be counted, it can only give effect to such objections as are sustained by an inspection of the papers, the returns, and the certificates, and by facts of which judicial notice can be taken, and have no right to go back of the returns further than I have stated. I submit that this is undoubtedly so from the following considerations:

The Constitution of the United States has carefully and expressly conferred on the States, as such, the function of choosing the President. It provides that each State, large or small, shall have two votes in the choice, and the number of additional votes is to be according to population.

The language of the Constitution is:

> Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in Congress.

The electors are State officers, deriving under and by virtue of the Constitution of the United States their power from the State; and that power is exercised and terminated within the State. This provision of the Constitution was not carelessly adopted. The framers of that instrument first decided that the President should be chosen by Congress, but after full debate and mature deliberation they saw the evils of placing one co-ordinate branch of Government under the control of another—the executive under the control of the legislative branch—and they then determined that, except to prevent a failure to elect, (and in that event the House, voting by States, should choose a President)—the framers of the Constitution, I say, determined that with the exception stated Congress should have nothing to do with making the choice of a President.

And still more thoroughly to separate Congress from the procedure of electing the President, the framers of the Constitution provided that no Senator or Representative should even be an elector. Knowing that if Senators or Representatives were electors the choice of a President would not be so thoroughly divorced from the Federal Government, and knowing that Senators or Representatives acting as electors might be tempted so to cast their votes as to throw the choice of a President, by reason of a failure of the electoral college to elect, upon Congress, the direction or mandate is issued to the States that Senators and Representatives must not be electors; and still further to secure the States in the exercise of this duty of choosing a President from any Federal influence, the Constitution provides that—

> No person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States shall be appointed an elector.

It would be an anomaly indeed if after the Constitution carefully excluded Congress from intermeddling in any manner with the election of the President by the States, further than to ascertain who the State said it had voted for, and to that end guarding every point of danger, that yet Congress possessed the right to go behind the duly authenticated papers sent up by the States, determine upon the fairness of the conduct of the inspectors, judges, and the canvassing and returning boards of the State, decide whether this parish should have been counted and that one rejected, and, in fact, turn itself into a grand returning board of the nation to examine, if it pleased, eight or ten million of votes and adjudicate which of two citizens had in the several States a majority.

If Congress has that power, it can by the exercise of its discretion—no, by the exercise of its uncontrolled will—make the votes elect for President whom it sees proper, or cast it upon Congress to elect when it sees fit; and thus Congress, and not the States, chooses the President. It is no answer to this view to say that we cannot assume that Congress will abuse its powers. The very possession by Congress of the power to go back of the returns sent up by the States without any abuse of the power is inconsistent with the provision that the election of the President is devolved upon the States.

The Constitution directs that the State shall appoint the electors "in such manner as the Legislature may direct." The State is to decide whether the elector is chosen according to its laws and to see to it that its officers do their duty. This is committed to the State just as it is committed to the General Government to determine whether collectors of customs, postmasters, marshals, and attorneys do their duty; and the General Government has no more right to question the decision of the State in the one case than the State has to question the decision of the General Government in the other.

I can conceive of nothing more at variance with the Constitution than that Congress should go into an investigation whether each of the three hundred and sixty-nine presidential electors fairly received a higher vote than his competitor; and, as the election turns on one electoral vote, and as the substantial inquiry is not the propriety of the procedure to elect, but is whether the electors were fairly elected, anything short of such a full inquiry would be of no avail.

Equally absurd in my opinion is it for Congress to investigate whether the three hundred and sixty-nine electors were all eligible—whether one was not a postmaster and another a commissioner, and another a district attorney of the United States. The provision of the Constitution that "no person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States shall be appointed an elector" is a mandate to the State, and it is confided to the State to enforce it. The State no doubt before the duty of the office is performed could by quo warranto or injunction prevent and restrain the ineligible person from acting, but which duty when performed even the State can no more vacate or set aside than you can set aside the judgment of a court because the judge was not of the constitutional age, or invalidate an act of Congress because it was passed by the vote of a Senator who was not thirty years old.

No, Mr. President, whether the power to determine which are votes to be counted is reposed with the President of the Senate, with Congress, or shall by the law in question be conferred upon the commission, either one of the three must take as true what the State, on whom the Constitution of the United States devolves the function of appointing presidential electors, says in that regard is true.

If it be said that to accept the returns from the State as conclusive might be to accept great frauds and to obtain a result founded on fraud, my answer is, then change the law; but while the appointment of electors is conferred upon the States you must accept the conclusions of the States. A judgment of a State court may be a great violation of right, but yet it must be enforced in every other State of the Union where the record is sent. A conviction may wrong the innocent, but yet the record of that conviction is conclusive all over the nation.

If the system is wrong change it, but while it stands it must be respected. Congress cannot be a grand returning board to investigate millions of votes, and the authenticated returns from the States are infinitely more likely to approximate to the truth than any investigation by Congress. What Senator of either party has not quietly smiled at the idea that what A B or C D testified to having seen or heard in Louisiana should constitute evidence upon which we should gravely adjudicate whether the one or the other of the two great political parties of the nation should come to power.

Further, sir, the provisions of the Constitution are in other respects inconsistent with the idea that Congress shall look back of the certificate, returns, and papers sent up by the State, to find out who has been elected an elector.

The Constitution provides that the electors shall give their votes by ballot. That imports secrecy. It provides again that the lists of their votes shall be transmitted sealed (secrecy again) to the President of the Senate, and that he shall first open them when the two Houses meet in joint convention, as it is called, to count the votes. So if the provisions and intent of the Constitution should be carried out, no one would know until the two Houses assembled in Joint Convention what had been the action of the electoral college.

By the Constitution the votes as soon as the certificates are opened are, without any delay, to be counted. It says the votes shall then be counted, and I believe there never has been an instance that after the process has commenced there has been any adjournment of the Joint Convention.

Now how in contemplation of the Constitution are the two Houses to go into an investigation back of the certificates, returns, and accompanying papers to canvass it may be millions of votes, to ascertain whether this elector or that had a greater number of votes than his competitor, or to investigate as to the eligibility of three hundred and sixty-nine electors? Then, too, the Constitution provides that no person except a natural-born citizen of the United States who is thirty-five years old, and who has been fourteen years a resident within the United States, shall be eligible to the office of President of the United States. How is Congress, when the count has commenced, to investigate and ascertain whether the person voted for was born this or the other side of the Canada line; whether he is thirty-four years and six months old or thirty-five years old, or whether his residence out of the United States was such that he had resided here only thirteen years and six months and not fourteen years?

No, the count must go on, and leave it to judicial or congressional proceedings afterward to vindicate the Constitution. And if from the very nature of the procedure provided by the Constitution the joint convention cannot stop to investigate the qualifications of the person voted for as President, surely it cannot investigate the qualifications or the eligibility of three hundred and sixty-nine electors, and for still stronger reasons cannot stop to canvass the millions of votes cast to find out who has been elected President.

And again, sir, the very nature of the tribunal that is to count the votes (assuming that it is either the two Houses of Congress or the President of the Senate) precludes the idea that there can be any investigation back of the certificates, returns, and acompanying papers.

The tribunal consists of nearly four hundred members. They are not one consolidated body but two distinct Houses, each of which must retire and vote separately on every question. They convene while Congress is in session a fortnight before the President is to be inaugurated. There is no time to bring witnesses from remote parts of the country or to examine them or to read documents or hear extended arguments.

If errors may be committed by the returning and canvassing boards of the State, let me say that you augment the probability of error a thousand-fold by having the joint convention of Congress assume the duty of reviewing and reversing the conclusions those boards have rendered.

No, sir; Congress can only take notice of such objections as appear on the returns, or such of which judicial notice can be taken, and the commission proposed has in the language of the act "the same powers, if any, now possessed for that purpose"—that is, for the purpose of determining the objection to a vote—"now possessed for that purpose by the two Houses acting separately or together."

Whether Congress or the commission can go back of the certificate, returns, and accompanying papers is one of the questions referred by the act to the commission. And I am entirely willing to abide by the decision of the fifteen sworn members of that commission. I have confidence in the truth.

It may be said that if this doctrine of not going behind the returns is true there was no necessity of taking testimony in Louisiana. I do not think there was the least necessity for so doing, excepting for the purpose of satisfying the public that no injustice had been done, or to give the Executive such information as he might require to decide which of the two governments he should recognize.

Again it may be said that if Congress is not to go back of the papers sent up it cannot adjudicate whether the law of Louisiana under which parishes were rejected because of intimidation was or was not in violation of the constitution of Louisiana, and therefore void, and so the rejection of the vote unlawful. I do hold, sir, that Congress is not a tribunal to decide the constitutionality of State laws; certainly not without parties, pleadings, evidence, counsel, or time for argument and deliberation.

But the constitution of Louisiana or of any other State has nothing to do with the electoral vote. Most powers enumerated in the Constitution are such as are conferred by the people of the States on the General Government; but there are some few powers conferred by the aggregated people of all the States, speaking through the Constitution, upon the States themselves.

Thus the Constitution confers upon each State the right to have here two Senators; that right comes from and depends on the Constitution of the United States alone. The Constitution of the United States provides that those Senators shall be chosen by the Legislature of the State. Suppose the constitution of Louisiana or of any other State ordained that the Senators of the United States for that State should be elected directly by the votes of the people, and the Legislature itself proceeded in despite of the constitution of the State to elect two Senators; no one will pretend that the election by the Legislature would be invalid because in violation of the State constitution. The action of the Legislature is not by virtue of the State constitution but by force of the Constitution of the United States, which is the paramount law.

So, too, the Constitution of the United States says that "each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors," &c. The whole power that the Legislature has to direct the manner in which electors shall be appointed it gets from the Constitution of the United States, and the discretion of the Legislature is absolute and uncontrolled by the State constitution. The Constitution of the United States did not repose in the convention which framed the constitution of Louisiana the right to fix the manner in which electors should be elected, but reposed that right in the Legislature of Louisiana, and if that Legislature sees proper to say that in the election of electors there shall be a returning board which shall have the power to reject the vote of a parish where intimidation and violence prevents a free election, of which that board is to judge, that legislation is valid and constitutional so long as it does not violate the Constitution of the United States, from which source alone the Legislature derives its power to legislate on that subject. So I do not see that there is any constitutional question to come before Congress or before the commission in that regard.

Again, it may be suggested that if Congress or the commission in their adjudications cannot go back of the returns, that the true state of the vote in Oregon cannot be disclosed.

In the first place, let me say that I do not believe that five democrats, drawn promiscuously, can be found who would take advantage of so gross an impropriety as the Oregon transaction. They will not be the five appointed on the commission. But further, let me say that if Mr. Hayes, because of our standing by the law in refusing to agree that Congress may usurp the power of making the President by canvassing the number of votes given to the several electors, is to be defeated, then we must submit to that great misfortune, but the people will appreciate it, and the result will be that that party which (with all respect to the democracy) I believe has a policy best calculated to advance the interests of the country will be in power for the next generation.

But as I understand the condition of the returns from Oregon, from rumor and the press, there is no necessity of going behind the returns to get at the truth. I understand that Cartwright, Odell, and Cronin have the governor's certificate. I understand that it appears by the return made by Cartwright and Odell, as well as by the return made by Cronin, that there was a vacancy; that fact, then, cannot be disputed; true, Cronin says there were two vacancies. He admits there was one. Cartwright and Odell say there was one. Cartwright and Odell filled the vacancy and three votes are registered for Governor Hayes. Cronin filled the two vacancies he claimed, and two votes are cast for Governor Hayes and one for Governor Tilden. And the only question is whether two or one constitutes a majority and a quorum of a college consisting of three members. Reserving the right to change my opinion, I think two and not one is a majority of three.

But with all these limitations as to the subjects that may be adjudicated while the count is being made, and with all the restrictions as to the nature of the evidence to be relied on, it still is true that there are questions which must be adjudged while the count is being made, such as the questions whether the State is in such relations with the National Government as entitles it to have its vote; whether the State had been duly admitted to the Union; if it appeared by the return of electors that the vote was not cast on the day fixed by law, whether that vitiated the vote; if a State had notoriously given its vote for one candidate and by sheer accident the list of votes had such a heading as to give it for another, whether it could or could not be counted. But these are all questions arising where there is but one return from a State, and with which the proposed commission has nothing to do.

The bill before us says the votes from the State shall be counted unless rejected by both Houses of Congress. Is not this right, or does it belong to the President of the Senate to decide whether the vote shall or shall not be counted?

The Constitution does not give him in words any such power; the enunciation of his powers stops short of this. When it said the certificates should be opened by the President of the Senate, and stated that the votes should then be counted, why did it not add "by him?" No Senator, no prudent citizen would to-day change the Constitution by adding the words "by him." It would be a tremendous power for one man to possess. If he has the power he could set at defiance both Houses of Congress and make President whom he pleased. The President of the Senate has never, though several cases have arisen, exercised or asserted any such power. Since 1817 both branches of Congress have claimed and exercised the power of adjudicating what votes should be counted. In 1865 a joint rule asserted it. At the last session a majority of the republican Senate by adopting a bill claimed this power to be in Congress. I believe the pending bill is right in saying that the vote shall be counted unless both Houses reject it.

There is another case of greater difficulty growing out of factions that have sprung up since and in consequence of the recent war in several of the States: it is the case of double returns being forwarded to the President of the Senate, each signed by different persons claiming to represent the true government. Who shall decide which return is to be recognized? Not the President of the Senate, for the reasons already given. It is clear that the votes which both Houses recognize shall be counted, but if the Senate says one return is the true one and the House says the other is the true one, is the vote to be lost? No; that would be a violation of the rights of the States, and besides the Constitution says the "votes shall be counted."

It is just here that the pressing necessity for an impartial tribunal, such as the pending bill provides for, arises; and the only question that tribunal or commission would according to my view have for adjudication would be which of the two asserted State governments is the true government of the State and which is its return; and those questions could be settled by the commission by taking judicial notice of notorious facts, by the papers, and perhaps testimony as to some single fact.

If the bill does not become a law and the House says one return from a State is the true one and the Senate says the other is the true one, what is to be done on the second Wednesday of February next? This is an important inquiry. All the President of the Senate could do would be to lay all the returns before the joint convention stated and tabulated in every form and then to adjourn the joint convention.

It is certain that, as but two citizens have been voted for, and as the States have all appointed electors, and as the number of electors is an uneven number, being three hundred and sixty-nine, it is certain, I say, that one of the two citizens voted for has been elected, and no case exists that casts the election of a President on the House of Representatives, for it is only, in the language of the Constitution, where "no person has a majority of the whole number of electors appointed" that the House of Representatives chooses the President; and for the same reason no case exists where the President of the Senate could act as President of the United States.

But how, if this bill does not pass, is it to be determined which of the two citizens voted for has been elected? It may ultimately be by adjudication in proceedings instituted by means of a writ of quo warranto in the supreme court of the District of Columbia and by an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States. And this exciting question, if the pending bill does not pass, may be immediately determined by the outgoing President, by reason of the necessity that rests on him to place the Government in the hands of some one, the necessity of handing over the archives of the Government, the Treasury, the Army, the Navy, to some one to take care and charge of them. In the absence of law he may be driven to determine, for the purposes stated, who has the majority of the 369 votes.

It seems to me, sir, that every consideration of prudence, propriety, and patriotism demands that we establish an entirley impartial tribunal to settle this vexed question. Neither party should seek any thing that is not fair. The pending bill secures to each party what is fair.

Sir, we have thus far been disappointed in the centennial of American liberty. We had hoped that it would be a sabbath of rest from party bickerings and sectional animosities. We had hoped that it would have been spent as a jubilee in reviewing our past history, considering what it had cost and what it was worth—contemplating our vast resources and our capabilities for usefulness to the world. We have been thus far disappointed. The people have been financially straitened, and the political skies have been somber and angry; but is there not a brighter vision to dawn upon us?

Sir, the present complication is very strange and far beyond that which could have been anticipated by any human foresight. I watched the progress of events in the several States, hoping that the result in one after the other would decidedly settle who was elected and relieve our institutions from the strain that is upon them.

And now let me ask, should we not gather a lesson of wisdom from this peculiar complication of events? And what is that lesson? Sir, if all the patriots of the land were assembled in an extended plain with the hills for walls and the heavens for a canopy to ask the God of nations for a boon, for what would we ask? It would not be for wealth, dominion, or empire; but I think it would be that our country might be delivered from the baneful consequences of party strife, that the time and energy, the money and the talent that is now expended and exhausted by millions of freemen against millions of freemen might be devoted to developing the resources of our country and elevating the condition our countrymen. That the freedmen of our land might make moral and intellectual progress; be taught to love and adorn their homes and educate their children; that all sections of the country might be blended in harmonious fellowship—

> And sovereign law, that state's collected will,
> O'er thrones and globes elate,
> Sit empress, crowning good, repressing ill.

And are we not brought to this crisis that we may receive that boon? Are we not by the present situation taught that millions of citizens cannot, even in party politics, overcome millions of freeman, but that, moderating our partisanship, we should unite to promote our country's truest welfare, place the best men in power, stand up for the highest public virtue, and thus advance the glory of the nation? I believe, sir, that is the lesson we should now learn. And if we could now adjust our present difficulties and then gather the wisdom the present complications are calculated to teach, this would be a more prosperous and a more happy nation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. INGALLS in the chair.) If there be no amendment proposed the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. MITCHELL. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope not.

Mr. SPENCER. I suggest that we proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is only a quarter past three.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon insist upon his motion?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon moves that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to amendment in the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I have no desire to-day to address the Senate. Indeed I desire to hear the members composing the committee on this subject before I venture to express my own views to the Senate. I think the question is of such transcendent importance that a vote ought not to be pressed except in a reasonable time, so as to bring the matter to a conclusion during the present week, so that if the bill is to pass it can pass in time before the first act is to be performed under its operation. I think, therefore, the Senate ought to be content with the arguments that have been made to-day; and I move that we now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator will withdraw that motion a moment that I may say a word in reply to him, I will renew it, if he desires, or yield to somebody else who will.

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If this bill is to pass, the first act to be done under it will be required to be done on the 30th day of January. This day is the 22d. The 30th is eight days from to-day.

Mr. CONKLING. A week from to-morrow.

Mr. EDMUNDS. A week from Tuesday, to-morrow. Now, I do not care whether the debate proceeds to-day or to-morrow; but I appeal to every Senator who desires to dispose of this question in a right way, whether it be to pass the bill or not to pass it, that this matter must be disposed of to-morrow finally one way or the other. If my honorable friend from Ohio is not ready to go on to-day, and with the fair notice that I feel obliged to give, I being in charge of the bill, that I shall feel it to be my duty to insist upon the Senate disposing of the question to-morrow—no matter if we do give a night to our country; it will not hurt us—I shall have no objection to having an executive session or adjourning now; but the Senate will see if there are many to speak that it might run it quite a way into the night to finish it to-morrow. But if you do not pass the bill to-morrow, and it is to pass, if it should pass on Wednesday and go to the House of Representatives on Thursday, then, as we understand by the rules of both Houses—that I think I am not out of the way in referring to—it would take, if anybody insisted upon it, three days, for the first, second, and third reading of the bill, to go through with it there; and then the President of the United States should have a reasonable time to consider whether he ought to sign it or ought not to sign it. Therefore, my friend from Ohio can readily perceive that after all the debate that has been had upon this subject at the last session of Congress, or the bill of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] now on your files, and which once passed the Senate——

Mr. CONKLING. Twice.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Which twice passed the Senate, my friend from New York says, and I believe with the vote of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN]—but it is quite immaterial whether with his vote or with mine—the subject has been so thoroughly debated in all its aspects in a general way that it is not unreasonable, as the subject is not a new one, considering the present situation of affairs, that we should be somewhat prompt—I do not say hasty, but deliberately prompt—in disposing of the subject in one way or another. If the Senator from Ohio prefers not to go on to-night, but to go on to-morrow, after this statement that I have made and the notice that I have given that I shall ask both the friends and the opponents of the measure to dispose of it to-morrow one way or the other, I shall not oppose his moving an executive session.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is no occasion and there is no propriety for haste in the debate on this bill, and in asking the vote of the Senate on it to-morrow. This is a bill to which every Senator ought to devote more than one or two days' passing deliberation. It took an able committee of both Houses of Congress three or four weeks to frame it. It is entirely novel in our whole political history. It presents questions of the gravest importance that can be presented by any committee or at any time. Both Houses will debate this question. The debate will not cease to-morrow. The other House, according to the order as I am informed already established, will take up the bill. Both Houses should debate it. There is no haste about it. Many Senators who have participated in framing this bill have not yet expressed their opinions and stated the reasons which have led them to their conclusion. They no doubt will take their own time to do so. I think my honorable friend from Vermont would do best for the public service, best for the interests of a great people, best for the order and dignity of the Senate and the good of our common constituents, not to hurry this matter. Two arguments have been made to-day, one on each side. They have been listened to with unusual attention. It seems to me that these arguments might well now be considered.

I am informed since I made the motion that a Senator is prepared, if the Senate really feel disposed to go further this afternoon, to speak. If so, I will at once give way to him; but if he prefers to take up the subject to-morrow morning after he has considered the arguments already made, and thinks it is better to do so, and if this debate is to go on until Thursday or Friday, there can be no harm done.

I assure the Senator from Vermont, so far as I am concerned, that within this week I am perfectly willing to have a vote, and within ample time to submit the case to the President, who will no doubt already be considering the bill, and in ample time to perform the first act under the bill, which I believe is on next Tuesday, is it not?

Mr. CONKLING. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it is due to the magnitude of the question that nothing like a dilatory motion, nothing like a captious opposition, nothing like even the ordinary opposition to an ordinary bill should be offered; but in due time, with deliberation, we should take the vote on this bill; there ought to be time for thought and reflection and debate. To-morrow probably is not the time. I will now give way if any Senator is ready to go on. I am perfectly willing to stay and hear any argument on the bill. I am not prepared to go on myself, but if any Senator is prepared I will give way to him, and if not, I shall insist upon my motion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I wish to say one word in reply to my honorable friend from Ohio.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio withdraw his motion.

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly, for the purpose of hearing the Senator.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My honorable friend from Ohio made use of one expression in which I think he did not display his usual accuracy. He said that this bill was perfectly novel in its character.

Mr. SHERMAN. In several of its provisions, I meant.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is only seventy-six years, as my friend from Ohio must well recollect as well as I do, that a bill involving exactly these principles passed the Senate of the United States, which provided that disputes of this character should be decided preliminarily, and I believe I may say finally—which goes much further than this bill does—by a body of men not composed entirely of the members of the two Houses. Certainly, then, my friend is a little mistaken in saying that we are startling the country with a novelty. The men who came very near to the time of the formation of the Constitution, many of whom participated in its formation, seem to have thought that it was the proper subject of legislation, and that the Constitution had not reposed it in a particular official, but that it was the subject of lawful regulation; and as a proper, lawful regulation, the Senate of the United States of that day—perhaps not so wise as we are, because it had not had the time to be so wise as we are; it had not had so long a history of the Republic before it—thought that it was within the competence and within the duty of Congress to provide, not for deciding arithmetic, but for deciding doubts and disputes respecting the character of what purported to be the certificates of electoral votes. But that is apart from what I wish to say. I only mention that in reply to the suggestion of my friend from Ohio that this is a novelty.

So I repeat, Mr. President, that you have before you a bill that is not startling for novelty, is not startling for methods, but it is only startling as it is looked upon by partisans on either side; no, I will not say partisans, but with views on either side as it may affect my wishes and those of my friend from Ohio and the wishes of other gentlemen who are supposed to be rather different from ourselves as to particular results. That is all there is about this bill that is startling; that it does not propose that either side shall enter into a race of mere athletic diligence, to see which can get first possession of the White House. That is all there is to it, and to settle in an orderly way how that is to be found out. So, then, there is no reason, as there might be some on some occasions, for assuming that here is a new proposition that nobody has ever thought of before, that is brought fresh upon the arena of the deliberative Assembly of the Republic.

My honorable friend from Ohio has discussed the principles of this very bill and within twelve months; and his views, as usual, have been stated with clearness and great force and great weight, and, as far as I can appreciate them, they are entirely in favor of the principle of this bill. So then we have not a novelty; we do not require so much time to deliberate in respect of principle as we otherwise might. But here we are drifting day by day toward the inevitable hour, as the law now stands, when we shall either have a regulated orderly course of procedure that the law, the benign instrument of the public will, has fixed, or we shall have no man can say what.

Hence it seems to me, Mr. President, that I am not unduly asking the Senate of the United States not to adjourn or go to the consideration of executive business at half past three o'clock in the afternoon, but that it should proceed with diligence, not with haste, to consider and dispose of this question. If any Senator desires to speak now, very well; but I repeat that I shall ask the judgment of the Senate to-morrow whether it ought to suffer this matter to be longer delayed.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, when I said this was a novel proposition I said what everybody in this country knows is perfectly true. So far as my knowledge of the history of this country goes, I know of no case where a measure containing provisions similar to this has been proposed in a law, certainly not in the act to which I suppose the Senator refers, of 1800 or 1801. Here is a blending of two distinct departments of the Government.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That was in the bill of 1800.

Mr. SHERMAN. Not in this form at all. Here is a proposition to ignore and deny all power on the part of the President of the Senate, who, by well-considered opinions of the ablest lawyers of this land, and by the expression I think of the opinion of the honorable Senator himself, can in a certain case decide upon the count of the vote. This power is denied. The power of the two Houses to some extent is denied. The two Houses are balanced with an evenly poised plan, so that they become nullities, and the whole of this great question as to who shall be President of the United States is transferred from the electoral college composed of men chosen under the laws of the States to a tribunal carefully selected, four of whom are named as if their names were printed on this bill, and the other is left to the uncertainty of doubt or chance.

It is to the consideration of a proposition like this, before the public mind has been directed to it, that we are called, and we are asked to deliberate and decide upon it hastily. I think we ought not to do so. There is no occasion for it, and I trust the Senate will not hurry any one into an argument of this matter until he is prepared to present his own views, supported if possible by lessons drawn from our history, or drawn from books, that it may be necessary to examine The gentlemen who have examined this matter in the committee having had three or four weeks of ample preparation, with a careful comparison of views between each other, with a careful examination of each other's views, and the study of the case, have the advantage no doubt; but we who have not had that advantage, and who have been engaged in the ordinary pursuits of the Senate, certainly have not yet become prepared to look into this subject, debate it, decide it for ourselves and for our constituents in the same manner as the gentlemen who served on this committee. I hope and expect to hear from each of them in his own good time his views and the reasons that have led him to concur in the bill presented to us, so that in the light of all the information, all the knowledge that this committee have gathered together, we may then exercise our duty to pass upon this subject for ourselves and our constituents.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, one remark fell from my colleague that induces me to say a word. He intimates that the other members of the committee ought to be heard from. I submit to him that they have been heard from; that on Thursday of last week they presented their written report accompanying this bill; that on Saturday the chairman of the committee delivered an elaborate speech in favor of the bill; that to-day another speech has been made by a member of the committee supporting the bill; and that but one very brief speech has been made on the other side. Now it seems to me that while acknowledging the duty which the committee owe to the Senate to give to the Senate all the possible light that their studies and reflection can enable them to give, there is some duty also due not only to the committee but to those who favor this bill, from those who oppose it; that it is time now for those who oppose this bill to state upon what grounds they oppose it.

I am sure there is no disposition on the part of any member of this committee to assume such infallibility of judgment as to ask that the Senate shall take his work without question. I am quite sure that in the three weeks of deliberation of that committee there was enough of humility displayed, and not one particle of improper self-esteem, to warrant me in saying that the committee will be very glad that their work shall be criticised as strictly and completely and thoroughly as any Senator may see fit to criticise it. But I do submit that it is time that we should hear from those who are opposed to the bill. Then, if some one who is opposed to the bill will speak, now that the floor is open to be taken by him, some other member of the committee or some other supporter of the bill will be ready to reply.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, two facts are very apparent to the Senate: first, the admitted gravity and importance of this measure, in both of which it can be scarcely said that it is second to any brought before the Congress of the United States; and, next, the necessity for diligence in the consideration of the question. The time fixed at which this bill, if it ever is to become a law, is to operate, is measured now by days, and not by weeks. Therefore, just in proportion to the gravity and importance of the measure comes the duty to decide upon it. In that aspect, while I concede the general views that I hold upon this measure to have been represented in the report to which I appended my signature, yet, at the same time, I have felt that upon such a subject there was something due from every man to this country, or to that portion of his countrymen to whom he was known, that he should give reason for the faith that was in him. That is why I propose, not to enlighten the Senate, but to justify myself in a grave emergency in my country's history, by stating in as short and direct terms as I could why it was I thought that the bill should become the law of the land. But while I felt that was a duty, yet I considered it secondary to the other fact of not by a desire to express my views retarding even for an hour the passage of the bill, should it be the pleasure of the Senate now to consider it. Therefore it was that rather than delay the passage of the bill to-night, if a vote could be reached upon it to-night, I should have sat in silence and permitted the bill so to be voted on, because my object is its passage, believing it to be just and really essential for the welfare of this country. But it does seem to me that those opposed to it should now show cause why this bill should not be a law. We have reached that point of the debate when their reasons should be given. As my friend from Ohio who sits near me [Mr. THURMAN] says, the reasons for the bill and the bill itself, intelligible upon its face, have been in the Senate now the greater part of a week. It was discussed with clearness and thoroughness and ability by the chairman of the committee on Saturday, in the presence of a full and, I am glad to say, most attentive Senate. It has been discussed to-day by the only member of the committee of either branch of Congress who withheld from it, for reasons no doubt good and satisfactory to himself, his signature and approval. He has given us to-day some of the reasons that moved him to that course, although he has also signified that, owing to indisposition, he is unable to complete his speech at this time.

Now, Mr. President, while I am desirous to be heard upon this bill I will most gladly defer altogether or to some other occasion the opportunity to express my views upon this all-important topic rather than that my speech should delay the action of the Senate upon it. If the bill is to go over and to go over because no gentleman here on the floor who desires to oppose its passage is ready to say a word against it, that will have to be decided by the pleasure of the Senate. I would not feel at liberty to ask the Senate to continue this discussion on my account. I hope, therefore, that the suggestion made by the honorable Senator from Vermont who has this bill in charge, that it may be taken up to-morrow and that if possible it may be disposed of to-morrow so far as this body is concerned, will meet the approval of the Senate, and that those who desire no delay and are willing to have the test of the Senate's sense on this subject, no matter which way they may vote, as well as those who desire the success of this measure, may do all that they can to carry the suggestion made by the honorable Senator from Vermont.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The question being put the motion was declared not to be agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for a division.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the bill be read a third time with the understanding——

Mr. SHERMAN. The bill has been reported to the Senate, and it may be necessary to offer amendments.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is a good time to offer them now.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is not a fair time. I am not prepared to offer amendments now. If the Senate of the United States under the lead of the Senator from Vermont wants to carry this bill, without popular understanding, while the voice of the people and the consideration of the people is given to it all over this broad country of ours, without a debate, in a manner unusual in the Senate of the United States, let it be done; but I state that I desire myself in due time to say something about this bill and shall desire perhaps to offer amendments to it. The Senator wishes to place it beyond the reach of amendment. Certainly it cannot be the desire to prevent a test of the Senate on questions of amendments. I do not want to be forced into this debate, nor is it a pleasure to have this done.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio acts a good deal to me as I once read in a story somewhere of some sailors in a boat that were drifting down stream toward some very rough water, and one cried out "Put the oar out on this side;" another said "No, that will not do, it ought to be put out on the other side;" and they kept on debating as to which way they should shift their oars until the boat went over the cataract. Now if my friend from Ohio is fond of that species of navigation, I am not. I wish to repeat to him that there is no disposition on the part of this committee or on my part to hurry this measure while popular opinion is considering it at all; but there is a disposition that this measure shall be fairly carried or fairly defeated and not left to drift to suit anybody's convenience until its value, good or bad, is entirely lost.

And let me tell my honorable friend from Ohio that it is a part of the duty of this Senate to legislate upon its own opinion, and not upon the popular opinion. I think I have heard him say something of the same character before now, when the elections have gone against us in particular districts and parts of the country. I always believed it to be a true saying that our duty is to legislate upon our own judgment. If we are to wait for popular opinion and appoint a committee or get certain newspapers to inquire what the popular opinion is before we either say yes or no to this measure, we shall wait a good while. My friend and I might differ as much upon that subject as it is said he and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BOGY] do about what the state of things in Louisiana is. We cannot do the thing that way. We have got to do it upon our responsible judgments, the very judgments that the Constitution of the United States has committed to us and commanded us under oath to perform, whether this measure first is what the Constitution authorizes, and second whether it is expedient for the public interests. There is no other question in it.

Now I wish to repeat what I said before, because it cannot be repeated too often, that nobody is surprised about this measure. We are exceedingly shy of coming to a discussion of it, it appears.

Mr. SHERMAN. So it appears.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So it appears. My honorable friend from Ohio, who was not a bit slow eleven months ago, has now suddenly discovered that there is great difficulty, and that it is a very novel subject and all that sort of thing. It is not novel, Mr. President, and when my honorable friend says that we are to cut off amendments, let me ask why are not amendments ready? The bill has been before the Senate for many, many days, and every day that is devoted to delay is a day devoted to adversity, no matter whether that adversity comes by the passage or by the defeat of the measure. Every day that is devoted to delay, I repeat, is devoted to adversity. According to the customs of this body, seventy-five or seventy-six gentlemen, all equally capable of illuminating this subject and every other one, might spend a year in high debate here; and if we did not stop debate by patience or by diligence, we should be as far from a decision as we are now. The honorable Senator, therefore, has no right to say that I or any other member of this committee desire to press this measure unduly. We have not shown the least disposition in the world to do so; but there will be an important responsibility upon somebody's shoulders, not to popular opinion but to truth and to justice, if we do not make progress; and that progress, in my opinion, will be made unless a majority of this body determine that it ought not to be made, and then they will be responsible for it. That is all I have to say. I do not wish to hurry anybody, but at some time, and at a very speedy time, this measure must either pass or fail. It will not die in its tracks, neither going forward nor going back.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] expressed his desire that this bill should go over until to-morrow. He desires to speak upon it himself, but is not ready to-night. I think other gentlemen wish to speak, but there seems to be a desire to force this bill through to-night—a very important measure.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My friend is mistaken about that. I said only that I wished to have it disposed of to-morrow. He should not say it is desired to force it through to-night.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator wants to have it read a third time and put into a peculiar attitude. No, Mr. President, this bill ought to be fairly discussed. It may seem very clear to some Senators; it may seem not so clear to others; but the idea is that we are to be forced now to take this bill, good or bad, under the apprehension of war! Adversity, we are told, is in store for us. We are to legislate here under terror. Some unseen, indescribable danger is hanging over us. We must put this bill through at once and we must disregard public opinion to do this. I do not believe in this danger. I know there have been threats of war and violence, and I know there has been an effort made to terrorize the country. We have been told we are to be overrun here by armed men; we are to have these corridors and halls and galleries filled with armed men; and we must make haste to legislate to avoid this danger. We are to be bull-dozed into the adoption of a bill that nobody wants. I do not believe there are half a dozen republicans on this floor who would want this bill if their judgments were to be consulted and if they were not under the influence of apprehension.

As far as I am concerned, I am not apprehensive of danger. I think the danger is to come from our own weakness and our own apprehensions. This is a very important measure, and there ought to be full time to discuss it. The idea is to force the vote to-morrow, that this bill must be disposed of so that some action can be had by to-morrow week, as if that was the last day, the very crack of doom. The law as it now stands provides for the counting of the votes on the 14th of February, but it must be anticipated two weeks; and if that is not done, adversity is to come upon us, something terrible is to happen!

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I admit that I am afraid. I am just so much of a coward as to be afraid to do wrong, and I hope I am brave enough not to be afraid to do right. Nobody has spoken of fears about these one hundred thousand men. They do not seem to exist in the imagination of anybody but my friend from Indiana. I have not even thought of them, so far as I remember, except in a very jocose connection, which it is not proper within the proprieties of this Chamber that I should refer to, that was stated in the newspapers. So the statement of the Senator from Indiana that anybody is to oppose this measure or vote for it on the ground of intimidation—a favorite phrase of my friend from Indiana and one in which I largely sympathize in the application that he usually makes of it—is only a part of his imagination. The true courage that belongs to an American Senator is the courage to follow the deliberate judgment upon the Constitution that my honorable friend has expressed and that the Senator from Ohio has expressed and that so many others have expressed when there was nothing to gain by the expression of their judgment, and that is, not to maintain the attitude that, because by the accident of politics we may be supposed to have a chance of gaining by having you, sir, in the Chair to decide this question, we will reverse now all that we have said before and insist upon that. Sir, truth and constitutional principle are two of those things that do not change according to men's wishes from day to day. They stand. And when this committee follow the opinions of my honorable friend from Indiana and my honorable friend from Ohio and many other gentlemen in now providing in a great emergency exactly that legislation in principle which they have before defined as being within the Constitution, and set aside that procedure which they seem now disposed to maintain, the propriety of which they had before condemned, I do not think we ought to be accused of cowardice. We ought rather to be thought as paying a devoted and respectful homage to the judgments of great statesmen, pronounced at a time when no bias of wish could influence their opinions. That is our attitude, and it is no other.

But the event for which this legislation is to provide is coming rapidly upon us. There is no disposition to press any gentleman; but there should be, and there must be, and there is, a disposition to be diligent.

Now, after all that has been said, if the honorable Senator from Ohio is not ready to go on to-day, in view of what has been said about finishing this matter to-morrow, I shall be perfectly willing that the honorable Senator from Ohio shall take the floor and yield it for an executive session or an adjournment. I have no disposition at all to press anybody; but the end of this thing being present, if Senators prefer to squeeze it into to-morrow, very good, if they are not ready to go on to-day, and the Senate can determine to-morrow whether it will stay and finish it or whether it will not. I do not wish to press anybody, but I do not intend to have the thing slumped, as the common expression is, by having it go on from day to day with one or two speeches and so on until the 4th of March. Now if it is agreeable to my honorable friend from Ohio who wishes to speak, I will myself move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. I make that motion, Mr. President.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Before the motion is put, if the Senator will allow me, I desire to say a word.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont withdraw his motion?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do so for a moment, or, if people prefer to go on now, entirely.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I see no necessity for going on with this measure now. The country is not prepared for it, I am sure. While I have the greatest deference to everything that is said by the great Senator from Vermont, I cannot agree with him in his desire to push this bill forward. To my mind it is wrong, and if the vote comes now I shall vote against the bill. Perhaps I may be convinced so as to change my mind. I look upon it now as a democratic measure, a measure in the interest of Mr. Tilden, to elect Mr. Tilden. I am a plain-spoken man and say what I think. I desire to hear the democrats give their opinions upon this subject. Let them tell us of the faith which is in themselves; I will listen to them with great attention, and after that I will decide how I ought to vote, and will vote according to my decision. I have a prejudice, probably because I am an old man, against all compromises.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So have I.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Every compromise of the Constitution in this country has been destructive of the interests of the country and destructive of the party which was flattered by the minority to make the compromise. That greatest of all our statesmen, Henry Clay, was destroyed by his first compromise on the Missouri question.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How was he destroyed?

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. He was destroyed because he never received the support of the country for that office which was the grand object of his ambition.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There are a good many destroyed people in this Chamber now. [Laughter.]

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. That may be so; but I trust that the Senator from Vermont will not place himself in that condition, because I love him. Look at the case of Webster. He yielded to the temporizing policy of compromise in his speech of March 7, 1850, and he never after retained his hold on the popular heart. So of Douglas, who brought forward his compromise in the Kansas-Nebraska bill under the delusive title of "popular sovereignty." Compromise destroyed them all. Here we have a committee most wisely or by accident—I think wisely—containing four of the greatest men in the Senate of the republican party, and three of them have voted to gratify their political opponents.

That, I suppose, is plain talk, but I mean it. I do not believe to-day, if the vote be taken, there will be three members of the democratic party who will vote in opposition to this bill. I am a plain man and I like to tell the truth. There is no danger, to my mind, of the Republic now. It has overcome every difficulty which has been presented to it and has always come out of the contest stronger than it was before. To my mind the Constitution has provided for every exigency that arises in deciding this contest; and I am for standing by the Constitution and not compromising it away.

What is the difference whether there is only a majority of one or whether there is a majority of twenty-one? The people of this country, when they are convinced that the majority is in favor of a particular candidate, will acquiesce in the result. Those who talk and bluster about fighting do not mean to fight. A brave man never brags about his courage, while the coward is very apt to talk about what he will do in a certain contingency, believing that that contigency will never occur to put his self-declared valor to the test.

One of the greatest objections, in my judgment, to this bill is making members of the Supreme Court of the United States, which hitherto has been above all party, partisans. The bill begins by taking five members of the Senate, three of whom, a majority, are to be republicans, and five members of the House, three of whom, a majority, are to be democrats, and then selects four of the judges, two of whom are democrats, or believed to be, and two of whom are republicans, and leaves them the right to select a fifth who virtually makes the decision. You start out with the idea that you have made a political court and you are trying by trick or by law to cheat the other party. If these gentlemen are to act according to their political bias, will they not each try to get the fifth on their side? Of course they will; and from the day you bring in that court as a tribunal to decide who shall fill the high office of President of this country, from that day every member of that court becomes a politician, and all the sanctity of his office will be gone. I cannot imagine that the people of this country will ever agree that it shall be taken from the high place it occupies now, down to party politics, that every man shall be a candidate for every place. How soon will it be after that court shall have decided who is President, before every member of that court will be asking for places for his sons, and his sons-in-law, and his cousins, and his other relations? Will not the offices be sought by them? They are but men, and will act like other men when you once take from them the dignity which the Constitution and the high position they have held has given to them. I want them to be pure for all time to come. Several times in my life prominent men on that bench have been unfortunately afflicted with the desire to become President. One of them especially, for whom I had great regard and who was a very great man, destroyed his usefulness by trying until he died to be President of the United States. He was as great a man as there is on the bench now, as great as any man you will probably put there. Why should we put this temptation before the men holding that high place?

I at present am opposed to it. I will listen, though, with great attention to every member of the democratic party upon the other side of the House who will give us his views. I think the republicans unfortunately for our side have been placed here with all this responsibility upon them, and I think in the goodness of their hearts and their great fears of the country being destroyed they have given way a little to our democratic friends.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Shall the bill be engrossed for a third reading?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, out of consideration for the wishes of the Senator from Ohio, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business; but I give notice at the same time that I shall ask the Senate to finish this bill to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After nine minutes spent in executive session the doors were re-opened, and (at four o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, January 22, 1877.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of Saturday last was read and approved.

FRENCH SPOLIATION CLAIMS.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to present the petition of John T. Pickett and Joseph J. Stewart, attorneys for the heirs of James H. Causten and others, asking that the unappropriated balance of the Geneva award be devoted to the payment of the French spoliation claims.

Several MEMBERS demanded the regular order of business.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Then I will present this petition under the rules and have it referred to the Judiciary Committee.

The SPEAKER. That can be done under the rules.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask, by unanimous consent, after the call of States and Territories for bills and joint resolutions for reference has been gone through with, that the House will then go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of finishing at once the Indian appropriation bill. It will facilitate the public business and will not take up more than an hour of the time of the House.

Mr. THORNBURGH and others demanded the regular order of business.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled an act (H. R. No. 4307) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the contingent fund of the House of Representatives, and for other purposes; when the Speaker signed the same.

MORNING HOUR.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, the morning hour commences at seventeen minutes after twelve o'clock, and this being Monday, the first business in order is the call of States and Territories, beginning with the State of Wisconsin, where the call rested at the conclusion of the morning hour on Monday last, for the introduction of bills and joint resolutions for reference to their appropriate committees, not to be brought back on motions to reconsider. Under this call memorials and resolutions of State and territorial Legislatures may be presented for reference and printing.

SETTLERS ON PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. STRAIT introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4481) for the relief of settlers on the public lands; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

IMMIGRATION, ETC.

Mr. STRAIT also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4482) making an appropriation for the preparation of a report on immigration and public lands; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Printing, and ordered to be printed.

EXEMPLIFIED COPIES—LAND OFFICE.

Mr. GOODIN introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4483) to authorize the money received by the General Land Office for exemplified copies to be used for the employment of clerical labor; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

E. F. WENCKEBACH.

Mr. KIDDER introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4484) for the relief of E. F. Wenckebach; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

STREET PAVING, ETC., WASHINGTON AND GEORGETOWN.

Mr. HALE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4485) to regulate street paving and repairs in Washington and Georgetown, District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. HALE. I ask for the reading of the bill in extenso.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I feel justified, Mr. Speaker, in again asking unanimous consent of the House, instead of consuming the time in the reading of all bills introduced for reference, that, after the States and Territories shall have been called through for the introduction of bills and joint resolutions for reference, the House shall then resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to go on with the Indian appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine introduced a bill for reference and demanded its reading, which he had a right to do, and the Clerk is proceeding with the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I presume the gentleman's object is to consume the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot look into the motives of members, and the Clerk will therefore proceed with the reading of the bill.

Mr. HALE. I have no objection whatever after the States and Territories have been called for the introduction of bills and joint resolutions for reference, to unanimous consent being given to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that unanimous consent shall be given immediately after the introduction of bills and joint resolutions to go into Committee of the Whole to take up the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. HALE. I have no objection to that proposition, that is, as soon as the first call for bills and joint resolutions has been gone through, that then the House shall go into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HOLMAN. It will only take half an hour, in my judgment, to finish the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. HALE. I do not object to the morning hour being terminated as soon as the States and Territories have been called through for bills and joint resolutions for reference.

The SPEAKER. In other words, the proposition is to cut off the introduction of House resolutions on the second call.

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. BANNING. Then I object.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection, as my object is to make available the time which otherwise would be consumed in the reading of these bills.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk then finished the reading of the bill.

The bill was referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

CONTESTED ELECTIONS FOR THE PRESIDENCY, ETC.

Mr. FRYE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4486) to establish a court for the trial of contested elections for the offices of President and Vice-President of the United States; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. FRYE asked that the bill be read through.

The bill was read in extenso, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

FISHERIES.

Mr. JOYCE presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Vermont, relative to fisheries in waters within the jurisdiction, in part, of different States and the British Provinces; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Whereas, under existing provisions of law and treaty, there is no adequate means of preventing or punishing the wrongful destruction of fish in the waters partly within the jurisdiction of the several States and the British Provinces of North America, by reason of which great injury is done to an important branch of industry, commerce, and food supply of the United States: Therefore,

Resolved by the senate and house of representatives, That our Senators be instructed and our Representatives in Congress be requested to use all proper efforts to the end of preserving and protecting such fisheries and the interests of the United States in the same.

REDFIELD PROCTOR,
President of the Senate.
JOHN W. STEWART,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. JOYCE also presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Vermont, in relation to the bankrupt law of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Resolved by the senate and house of representatives, That our Senators in Congress be instructed and our Representatives requested to use their votes and influence for the repeal of the act of Congress known as the general bankrupt law of the United States.

JOHN W. STEWART
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
REDFIELD PROCTOR,
President of the Senate.

DONATION OF CONDEMNED ORDNANCE.

Mr. CRAPO introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4487) donating condemned ordnance to Post No. 1, Grand Army of the Republic, New Bedford, Massachusetts; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

THOMAS A. WESTON.

Mr. SEELYE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4488) to confirm the term for the period of seventeen years from the date of its original grant of the patent of Thomas A. Weston, No. 67470, granted August 6, 1867, re-issue No. 4791, July 9, 1872; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

RECEIVERS OF NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. WARNER introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4489) amending the act entitled "An act authorizing the appointment of receivers of national banks, and for other purposes;" which was read a first and second time.

Mr. WARNER. I ask that the bill may be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. COX. I think that the bill to which this is an amendment came from the Committee on Banking and Currency; but I have no objection to the reference suggested.

The bill was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

TELEGRAPHIC COMMUNICATION BETWEEN AMERICA AND EUROPE.

Mr. WOOD, of New York, (by request,) introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4490) to encourage and promote telegraphic communication between America and Europe; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

SURETIES OF ROBERT H. LANE.

Mr. WOOD, of New York, also (by request) introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4491) for the relief of the sureties on the official bond of Robert H. Lane, late collector of internal revenue, second district of Texas; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

SECOND JUDICIAL DISTRICT, NEW YORK.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. By request of a large number of the members of the bar of the city of New York, ratified by the action of the Bar Association of that city, I introduce for reference a bill to amend chapter 6, title 53, of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and to provide for the appointment of associate justices of the second judicial district of New York.

The bill (H. R. No. 4492) was received, read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

CLERKS OF UNITED STATES COURTS.

Mr. WILLIS introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4493) in relation to clerks, deputy clerks, and assistant clerks of the United States courts; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLICATION AND SALE OF PUBLIC DOCUMENTS.

Mr. LEAVENWORTH introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4494) to provide for the publication, distribution, and sale of public documents; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Printing, and ordered to be printed.

HENRY G. HEALY.

Mr. MACKEY (by request) introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4495) for the relief of Henry G. Healy, late lieutenant-colonel of the Sixty-fifth Regiment of New York Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

COUNTING THE ELECTORAL VOTE.

Mr. FREEMAN. The governor of Pennsylvania has transmitted to me a series of resolutions adopted by the Legislature of that State in relation to a peaceful settlement of the pending difficulties in relation to the counting of the electoral vote. I ask that the resolutions may be read, printed in the RECORD, and referred to the select committee on counting the electoral vote.

The resolutions were read, referred to the select committee on counting the electoral vote, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD. They are as follows:

Whereas the tranquillity of the country has been disturbed and its business prosperity imperiled by the extraordinary difficulty of ascertaining in the nearly balanced vote what has been the result of the late election for the electors of President and Vice-President;

And whereas to allay any excitement that may endanger the public peace and precipitate upon the people the calamities of civil war, from which they have been lately delivered, it seems fit and proper that the Legislatures of the States whose prerogatives and vital interests are involved in the issue should declare and emphasize those principles embodied in the national Constitution by which the decision of the pending question can alone be safely and lawfully reached:

Resolved by the senate, (the house of representatives concurring,) That the will of the people in electing a President and Vice-President of the United States can only be expressed in the manner prescribed by the Constitution, and the persons having the majority of the votes of the electors appointed by the States of the Union in the manner prescribed by the Legislatures thereof must be by the force of the Constitution and laws declared President and Vice-President respectively, and must be on the 4th of March inaugurated, and thereafterward duly respected as such.

Second. That all factious opposition, and all threats of violence designed or intended to prevent or imperil the declaration and confirmation of the constitutional election of the President and Vice-President, are unpatriotic in spirit, dangerous and revolutionary in tendency, and merit and should receive the condemnation of an outraged and indignant people.

Third. That the lists which the duly appointed electors of the States respectively are required by the Constitution of the United States to make of the persons voted for as President and Vice-President, and the number of votes for each, and which are to be by the electors certified and transmitted by them sealed to the President of the Senate, and which certificates are to be opened by him in the presence of the two Houses of Congress, and counted, are the constitutional evidence of the votes cast for President and Vice-President.

Fourth. That under the Constitution the persons having the majority of all the votes actually cast by the duly appointed electors of the States, respectively, are by force of the Constitution and laws the President and Vice-President from and after the beginning of their term of office, and any attempt to defeat the election of a President or of a Vice-President by either House of Congress upon the pretext that certain persons duly certified to be the electors of any State were not such electors, or by throwing out or refusing to count the legally certified votes of any State, or by impeding the counting of the electoral vote to ascertain the result, or for any other cause than that provided for in the Constitution, when no person has a majority of votes of the electors duly appointed, will be a proceeding fraught with danger to the public peace, perilous to the stability of our Government, and exposing our nation to contempt in the general opinion of mankind.

Resolved, That our Senators in Congress be instructed and our Representatives requested to let their action on this question conform to the spirit of this declaration.

Resolved, That the governor be requested to have a copy of this preamble and resolutions forwarded to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress as early as convenient.

The foregoing preamble and resolutions have passed the Legislature.

THOS. B. COCHRAN,
Clerk of the Senate.
WM. C. SHURLOCK,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

JANUARY 16, 1877.

Mr. WOOD, of Pennsylvania, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4496) amendatory of the act entitled "An act fixing the amount of United States notes, providing for a redistribution of national-bank currency, and for other purposes," approved June 20, 1874; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. WOOD, of Pennsylvania. I ask that the bill may be read.

The bill was read at length, was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

IMPORT DUTIES ON SALTS OF QUININE.

Mr. HENKLE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4497) to abolish all import duties on salts of quinine; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

E. H. LIVELY.

Mr. GOODE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4498) for the relief of E. H. Lively, postmaster at Williamsburgh, Virginia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Claims, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HALE. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. HALE. I move that the rules be suspended and the resolution which I send to the desk be adopted.

Mr. WILLIS. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment. I rise to make a personal explanation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WILLIS] desires to make a personal explanation. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. WILLIS. I ask the Clerk to read the passage I have marked in an editorial of the New York Herald, published yesterday, Sunday, January 21st.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEMOCRATIC LUNACY.

Mr. WILLIS, of this city, and Mr. TARBOX, of Massachusetts, have won for themselves the unenviable distinction of being the first members of the House of Representatives to raise a voice against the joint committee's plan for counting the electoral vote.

Mr. WILLIS. That is enough; stop there.

Mr. RUSK. Let us have the rest read.

Mr. WILLIS. After I get through.

The title of that editorial is a misnomer. It should have been "journalistic lunacy." The paragraph so far as relates to me is wholly untrue. No word uttered by me on Saturday could be construed in opposition to the bill reported by the joint committee on the electoral count. I did repel with all the energy I could command the monstrous assumption that the President of the Senate could count the electoral votes. I did unveil a conspiracy which aimed at the overthrow of popular government and the inauguration of the defeated candidate as President. I did insist that the power to count the votes resides in Congress by virtue of the text of the Constitution itself, and also by uninterrupted usage since the foundation of the Government. I did declare that I would oppose any measure making the electoral vote to depend upon chance; also, that I would oppose any delegation of power to a body outside of Congress, which is forbidden by the clear text of the Constitution. But I believe that the bill reported by this joint committee combats no proposition that I urged. I deem it an act sublime in disinterestedness, in patriotism, and statesmanship; a sure voucher that the Republic will endure through the ages, and I shall support it with sincerity and zeal.

PAY OF A MEMBER OF CONGRESS.

Mr. HALE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) agreed to:

Resolved, That the rules be suspended so that it shall be in order when the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill is being considered to submit the following amendment, to wit:

To pay to JOHN Y. BROWN the pay and mileage of a member of the Fortieth Congress, less the sum of $2,500 heretofore paid him.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MILLS. I desire to introduce a bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would state that there are quite a number of gentlemen who desire to refer bills, and he would suggest to the House the propriety, as call of the roll of States for the introduction of bills was not completed either to-day or last Monday, that gentlemen have the privilege of introducing bills under the rule by unanimous consent. The Chair hears no objection.

DEBTS DUE IN SOUTHERN STATES.

Mr. MILLS introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4499) to authorize and provide for the payment of all debts contracted by the Government in certain States, therein named, since the close of the war; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

SHIP-CHANNEL IN GALVESTON BAY, TEXAS.

PALAIS ROYAL HOTEL, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4514) to incorporate the Palais Royal Hotel of District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

JANE D. COTTON.

Mr. AINSWORTH introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4515) granting a pension to Jane D. Cotton; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

BENJAMIN F. RUNYON.

Mr. DUNNELL introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4516) granting a pension to Benjamin F. Runyon; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

WESTERN CHEROKEES.

Mr. WILSHIRE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4517) to refer the claim of the Western Cherokees or "old settlers" against the Government of the United States to a board of commissioners for adjustment and final settlement; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

MRS. SARAH J. CHIPMAN.

Mr. PRATT introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4518) to grant a pension to Mrs. Sarah J. Chipman; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

ADOLPH NIMITZ.

Mr. SMALLS introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4519) to re-imburse Adolph Nimitz, trustee for Meta Nimitz, his wife, for losses sustained at Beaufort, South Carolina, November 8, 1861; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

FIRE AT MADISON BARRACKS, NEW YORK.

Mr. HOGE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4520) for the relief of officers of the United States Army who suffered loss by fire at Madison Barracks, New York, November 6, 1876; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CHARLOTTE F. CLARK.

Mr. FORT introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4521) granting a pension to Charlotte F. Clark, widow of Bela T. Clark, late captain Company D, Forty-second Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

UNITED STATES ARMY.

Mr. THROCKMORTON moved to suspend the rules and adopt the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be, and is hereby, directed to inquire and report to this House the present strength, location, and occupation of the troops of the United States Army; how many are now being used upon the Indian and Mexican frontier, and what troops, if any, have been withdrawn therefrom, and if the safety of the frontier does not demand that all the troops withdrawn should be replaced; how many are now located in and around Washington; when the troops were ordered to Washington; the nature of their orders; by whom made, and the purpose for which they are or have been ordered here; the amount paid for transportation of troops since July last; by whom and to whom paid. Said committee are hereby authorized to send for persons and papers.

The question being taken on the motion to suspend the rules, there were—ayes 109, noes 73, less than two-thirds voting in the affirmative.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 142, nays 87, not voting 60; as follows:

Walker, Walling, Walsh, Warner, Watterson, Erastus Wells, Whitthorne, Wike, Alpheus S. Williams, Jere N. Williams, Willis, Wilshire, Benjamin Wilson, Fernando Wood, Yeates, and Young—142.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, George A. Bagley, John H. Baker, William H. Baker, Ballou, Banks, Blair, Bradley, William R. Brown, Horatio C. Burchard, Burleigh, Cannon, Carr, Chittenden, Conger, Crapo, Crounse, Danford, Davy, Denison, Dobbins, Dunnell, Eames, Evans, Flye, Fort, Foster, Freeman, Frye, Garfield, Hale, Haralson, Benjamin W. Harris, Hathorn, Hendee, Henderson, Hoar, Hoge, Hoskins, Hubbell, Hunter, Hurlbut, Hyman, Joyce, Kasson, Kelley, Kimball, Lapham, Lawrence, Leavenworth, Lynch, Magoon, MacDougall, McDill, Miller, Monroe, Nash, Norton, Oliver, Page, Pierce, Plaisted, Potter, Pratt, Rainey, Robinson, Rusk, Sampson, Seelye, Sinnickson, Smalls, A. Herr Smith, Strait, Stowell, Thornburgh, Martin I. Townsend, Tufts, Van Vorhes, Wait, Waldron, John W. Wallace, Whiting, Charles G. Williams, William B. Williams, James Wilson, Alan Wood, jr., and Woodworth—87.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Bass, Beebe, Bliss, Buckner, Cason, Caswell, Chapin, John B. Clarke of Kentucky, Collins, Darrall, Durand, Durham, Egbert, Faulkner, Field, Gibson, John T. Harris, Hays, Hereford, Goldsmith W. Hewitt, Hill, Hurd, Jenks, Frank Jones, Thomas L. Jones, King, Le Moyne, Lord, Lynde, McCrary, Meade, Morrison, Odell, O'Neill, Packer, William A. Phillips, Platt, Purman, John Reilly, James B. Reilly, Miles Ross, Sobieski Ross, Schumaker, Stephens, Stone, Thomas, Washington Townsend, Gilbert C. Walker, Alexander S. Wallace, Ward, Warren, G. Wiley Wells, Wheeler, White, Whitehouse, Wigginton, Willard, Andrew Williams, James Williams, and Woodburn—60.

So (two-thirds not voting in favor thereof) the rules were not suspended.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. ELLIS. My colleague, Mr. GIBSON, is detained from the House on account of sickness.

Mr. JOHN REILLY. I am paired off with my colleague, Mr. O'NEILL, on all political questions; and deeming this question of that nature I refrain from voting.

Mr. WALLACE, of South Carolina. On this question I am paired with the gentleman from California, Mr. WIGGINTON.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

CHOCTAW INDIANS.

Mr. SEELYE. I submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the rules be suspended so as to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3798) for the relief of the Choctaw Indians and bring the same before the House for consideration at this time.

May I have unanimous consent simply to state the object of this bill?

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the gentleman will proceed. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. SEELYE. The bill which this resolution proposes to consider provides simply that the Choctaw Nation may have permission to bring suit for their claim before the Court of Claims. If the bill can be brought up for consideration, I think but a few moments will be required to pass it.

Mr. FORT. Is this debate proceeding by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asked unanimous consent (which was given) to make a brief statement in reference to the subject. The question is on suspending the rules.

Mr. FORT. Unanimous consent ought to be given for debate on the other side.

The SPEAKER. This is a motion to suspend the rules and consider the bill, not to pass it by this vote.

Mr. PAGE. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts propose to allow the proposition to be debated?

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the resolution will be again read.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts explain what consideration he proposes that this bill shall receive—how long a consideration?

Mr. SEELYE. Of course I propose to leave that entirely to the House. I do not suppose that any lengthy consideration is necessary or would be desirable. It is a simple matter and can be explained in a very few minutes. The House can judge very readily whether the bill is proper or not.

Mr. HOLMAN. This subject is, of course, very well understood by members of the House. Time and again during a great many years past the subject has been before Congress for consideration and the claim has been uniformly rejected, as it was recently rejected by the Interior Department.

Mr. WILSHIRE. I rise to a point of order. I submit that the motion to suspend the rules is not debatable.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the effect of this suspension of the rules will be to pass the bill, I hope it will not be agreed to.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 101, noes 48.

Mr. HOLMAN. This is so important a measure that I demand the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the rules.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 141, nays 74, not voting 74; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Adams, Ainsworth, Anderson, Ashe, Bagby, George A. Bagley, John H. Bagley, jr., William H. Baker, Ballou, Banning, Bland, Boone, Bradley, William R. Brown, Burleigh, Campbell, Cate, Chittenden, Conger, Cook, Cowan, Crapo, Davy, Dibrell, Dobbins, Dunnell, Eames, Ellis, Evans, Finley, Flye, Franklin, Freeman, Frye, Fuller, Garfield, Gause, Goode, Goodin, Gunter, Hancock, Haralson, Benjamin W. Harris, Henry R. Harris, Harrison, Hartzell, Hathorn, Haymond, Hendee, Abram S. Hewitt, Hoar, Hoge, Hooker, Hopkins, Hubbell, Hunter, Hurd, Hurlbut, Hyman, Joyce, Kasson, Kelley, Lamar, Franklin Landers, George M. Landers, Lane, Le Moyne, Levy, Lord, Luttrell, Lynch, MacDougall, McDill, McFarland, Meade, Metcalfe, Miller, Milliken, Mills, Money, Morgan, Mutchler, Nash, Norton, Oliver, Payne, Phelps, Pierce, Poppleton, Pratt, Purman, Rainey, Rea, John Reilly, Rice, Riddle, John Robbins, William M. Robbins, Robinson, Sayler, Scales, Schleicher, Seelye, Sheakley, Singleton, Slemons, Smalls, Southard, Stanton, Strait, Stowell, Tarbox, Thompson, Throckmorton, Martin I. Townsend, Tufts, VanVorhes, John L. Vance, Robert B. Vance, Waddell, Wait, Charles C. B. Walker, Alexander S. Wallace, Walling, Walsh, Ward, Warner, Warren, Watterson, White, Whiting, Whitthorne, Wike, Alpheus S. Williams, Wilshire, Benjamin Wilson, James Wilson, Alan Wood, jr., Woodworth, and Young—141.

NAYS—Messrs. Atkins, John H. Baker, Blount, Bradford, John Young Brown, Horatio C. Burchard, Samuel D. Burchard, Cabell, John H. Caldwell, William P. Caldwell, Candler, Cannon, John B. Clarke of Kentucky, John B. Clark, jr., of Missouri, Clymer, Cochrane, Cox, Cutler, Danford, Davis, De Bolt, Douglas, Felton, Forney, Fort, Glover, Hale, Andrew H. Hamilton, Robert Hamilton, Hardenbergh, Hartridge, Hatcher, Henderson, Holman, Hoskins, Humphreys, Hunton, Kehr, Kimball, Lawrence, Leavenworth, Mackey, Magoon, Maish, McMahon, Monroe, Morrison, Neal, New, O'Brien, Page, John F. Philips, Piper, Potter, Powell, Reagan, Roberts, Sampson, Savage, A. Herr Smith, William E. Smith, Sparks, Stenger, Stevenson, Swann, Tesse, Terry, Tucker, Turney, Waldron, Erastus Wells, Charles G. Williams, Jere N. Williams, and Yeates—74.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Banks, Bass, Beebe, Bell, Blackburn, Blair, Bliss, Bright, Buckner, Carr, Cason, Caswell, Caulfield, Chapin, Collins, Crounse, Culberson, Darrall, Denison, Durand, Durham, Eden, Egbert, Faulkner, Field, Foster, Gibson, John T. Harris, Hays, Henkle, Hereford, Goldsmith W. Hewitt, Hill, House, Jenks, Frank Jones, Thomas L. Jones, King, Knott, Lapham, Lewis, Lynde, McCrary, Odell, O'Neill, Packer, William A. Phillips, Plaisted, Platt, James B. Reilly, Miles Ross, Sobieski Ross, Rusk, Schumaker, Sinnickson, Springer, Stephens, Stone, Thomas, Thornburgh, Washington Townsend, Gilbert C. Walker, John W. Wallace, G. Wiley Wells, Wheeler, Whitehouse, Wigginton, Willard, Andrew Williams, James Williams, William B. Williams, Willis, Fernando Wood, and Woodburn—74.

So (two-thirds not having voted in favor thereof) the rules were not suspended.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

During the roll-call a message, in writing, was received from the President of the United States by his Private Secretary, Mr. U. S. GRANT, Jr.

The message further announced that the President had approved and signed January 20, 1877, an act (H. R. No. 2287) for the relief of Peters & Reed, naval contractors at the Norfolk navy-yard in the year 1860.

ASKING LEAVE TO VOTE.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I was not within the bar before the last name on the roll was called, but I should like to have my vote recorded.

Mr. FORT. I should like to accommodate the gentleman, but under the circumstances I must object.

Mr. CAULFIELD. I was absent from the House engaged in committee-room on public business when my name was called, and ask leave to vote.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois was not present before the last name on the roll was called, and asks leave to vote. Is there objection? The Chair puts this question distinctly because the vote is very close.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the Chair permit me to ask whether the rule is not now, at any time when the roll was called, at the beginning, or while it was proceeding; and whether that does not bring the member within the rule?

The SPEAKER. The rule does not read so, and the Chair is obliged to conform to the language of the rule.

Mr. KELLEY. It has always been so considered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair begs leave to differ from the gentleman.

Mr. HOAR. I ask the Clerk to read the rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

29. No member shall vote on any question in the event of which he is immediately and particularly interested, or in any case where he was not within the bar of the House when the question was put.—April 17, 1789. When the roll-call is completed, the Speaker shall state that any member offering to vote does so upon the assurance that he was within the bar before the last name on the roll was called.—March 19, 1869. Provided, however, That any member who was absent by leave of the House may vote at any time before the result is announced.—March 2, 1865. It is not in order for the Speaker to entertain any request for a member to change his vote on any question after the result shall have been declared, nor shall any member be allowed to record his vote on any question if he was not present when such vote was taken.—May 27, 1870.

Mr. KELLEY. With due deference to the opinion and memory of the Speaker, I beg leave to suggest that any member who was present when the question was put, or before the last name was called, has the clear right to vote. And during my now somewhat extended career, such has been the uniform ruling. I have frequently been in the House when the question was put, gone out during the progress of the call, and returned and voted under the rule; and I have seen hundreds of others do the same thing.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman may have had that permission given to him if he was on a committee that had leave to sit during the sessions of the House.

Mr. HOAR. Does the Chair believe that a rule which states that a member who was within the bar before the last name on the roll was called shall vote, cannot vote if he were in the House before it was called?

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman did not respond to his name when it was called, the practice as well as the wording of the rule is that he must give assurance on the request of the Speaker that he was within the bar before the last name on the roll was called, before he can vote. That is the rule and so the Chair decides.

Mr. HOAR. There was a misunderstanding of the ruling of the Chair. It was understood that the member must be here when the last name on the roll was called.

Mr. KELLEY. Such was my understanding of the ruling of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair made no such ruling.

Mr. CAULFIELD. I will state, Mr. Speaker, that I was not within the bar at the beginning or end of the roll-call; that I was absent on the Judiciary Committee to ascertain how I should vote on a pending measure before that committee, and I now ask leave to have my vote recorded.

Mr. FORT. Will the Chair allow me to state the reason why I object?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman objects, and that is sufficient.

Mr. CAULFIELD. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. FORT. I have objected to others, and of course must object in this case.

Mr. CAULFIELD. I will then state, Mr. Speaker, that I was absent on the business of the House.

Mr. LAPHAM. I was not present at the close of the roll-call, having been called to the Senate on important business. I ask unanimous consent that I may vote.

Mr. SAVAGE. I object.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed, without amendment, bills of the House of the following titles:

The bill (H. R. No. 3575) granting a pension to Eliza A. Blaze, widow of Abner T. Blaze, late a private in Company C, Thirteenth Indiana Cavalry Volunteers;

The bill (H. R. No. 3511) granting increased pension to Thomas G. Kingsley; and

The bill (H. R. No. 3038) granting a pension to Almon F. Mills, late a private in Company K, Twenty-ninth Regiment Ohio Volunteers.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House was requested, the bill (H. R. No. 4168) to amend section 1 of the act of May 12, 1864, for a grant of land to the State of Iowa, to aid in the construction of a railroad in said State.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. No. 1152) granting a pension to Amaza J. Finch;

A bill (S. No. 855) making an appropriation to pay the claim of Benjamin Fenton and D. W. Fenton; and

A bill (S. No. 807) for the relief of John E. Catlett, of Hannibal, Missouri.

CLAIMS FOR WAR LOSSES.

Mr. HUNTER. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the joint resolution which I send to the desk be passed.

The Clerk read as follows:

A joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two-thirds of each House concurring therein,) That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of said Legislatures, shall be valid as a part of the Constitution, namely:

"ARTICLE XVI.

"No claim shall ever hereafter be allowed or paid by the United States, in the shape of damages or otherwise, for any kind of property, real or personal, used, consumed, injured, or destroyed by United States troops, or by or through any officers, civil or military, acting under or by authority of the United States, or from any other cause whatever, during the suppression of the late rebellion in any of the States that were in rebellion against the Government of the United States; or, for any property used, consumed, injured, or destroyed, as aforesaid, during such rebellion outside of said States that were in rebellion, and which belonged to persons residing within such States that were in rebellion, unless the property at the time it was so used, consumed, injured, or destroyed, belonged to persons who were during all the time of such rebellion loyal to the Government of the United States and gave neither aid nor encouragement to the enemy."

The question being taken on a division by sound, the Speaker said that he was in doubt whether two-thirds had voted in the affirmative.

Mr. HUNTER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WADDELL. I ask that the resolution may be again reported.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. REAGAN. Is that debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The motion is to suspend the rules and pass the joint resolution, and on that question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. EDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HUNTER] a question.

Mr. PAGE. I demand the regular order.

Mr. HUNTER. I object to debate.

Mr. EDEN. I do not want to debate, but to ask a question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that that would be in the nature of debate.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 125, nays 71, not voting 93; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Anderson, Bagby, George A. Bagley, John H. Bagley, jr., John H. Baker, William H. Baker, Ballou, Banks, Bell, Bradley, William R. Brown, Horatio C. Burchard, Burleigh, Cannon, Caswell, Clymer, Cochrane, Conger, Crapo, Cronnse, Cutler, Danford, Davy, Denison, Dobbins, Dunnell, Durand, Eames, Evans, Flye, Fort, Foster, Freeman, Frye, Fuller, Garfield, Goodin, Hale, Andrew H. Hamilton, Hardenbergh, Benjamin W. Harris, Harrison, Hartzell, Hendee, Henderson, Abram S. Hewitt, Hoar, Hoge, Holman, Hopkins, Hoskins, Hubbell, Humphreys, Hunter, Hurlbut, Hyman, Joyce, Kasson, Kehr, Kimball, Lapham, Leavenworth, Luttrell, Magoon, MacDougall, McCrary, McDill, McMahon, Metcalfe, Monroe, Morgan, Neal, New, Norton, Oliver, Page, Phelps, Pierce, Piper, Plaisted, Poppleton, Potter, Powell, Pratt, Rice, John Robbins, Robinson, Rusk, Sampson, Savage, Seelye, Sinnickson, A. Herr Smith, Sparks, Springer, Stenger, Stevenson, Stowell, Strait, Tarbox, Teese, Thompson, Thornburgh, Martin I. Townsend, Tufts, Turney, Van Vorhes, John L. Vance, Wait, Waldron, John W. Wallace Ward, Warner, White, Whiting, Wike, Willard, Alpheus S. Williams, Charles G. Williams, William B. Williams, Willis, James Wilson, Alan Wood, jr., and Woodworth—125.

NAYS—Messrs. Ainsworth, Ashe, Atkins, Blackburn, Bland, Blount, Boone, Bradford, Bright, John Young Brown, Samuel D. Burchard, Cabell, John H. Caldwell, William P. Caldwell, Candler, Cate, Caulfield, John B. Clarke of Kentucky, Cook, Culberson, Davis, Dibrell, Douglas, Eden, Ellis, Felton, Finley, Forney, Franklin, Glover, Goode, Gunter, Robert Hamilton, Hancock, Henry R. Harris, Hartridge, Hatcher, Henkle, Hooker, Hunton, Thomas L. Jones, Knott, Lamar, Lynch, Milliken, Mills, O'Brien, John F. Philips, Rainey, Reagan, Riddle, William M. Robbins, Scales, Singleton, Slemons, Smalls, William E. Smith, Southard, Swann, Terry, Throckmorton, Tucker, Robert B. Vance, Waddell, Erastus Wells, G. Wiley Wells, Whitthorne, Jere N. Williams, Wilshire, Fernando Wood, and Yeates—71.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Abbott, Banning, Bass, Beebe, Blair, Bliss, Buckner, Campbell, Carr, Cason, Chapin, Chittenden, John B. Clark, jr., of Missouri, Collins, Cowan, Cox, Darrall, De Bolt, Durham, Egbert, Faulkner, Field, Gause, Gibson, Haralson, John T. Harris, Hathorn, Haymond, Hays, Hereford, Goldsmith W. Hewitt, Hill, House, Hurd, Jenks, Frank Jones, Kelley, King, Franklin Landers, George M. Landers, Lane, Lawrence, Le Moyne, Levy, Lewis, Lord, Lynde, Mackey, Maish, McFarland, Meade, Miller, Money, Morrison, Mutchler, Nash, Odell, O'Neill, Packer, Payne, William A. Phillips, Platt, Purman, Rea, John Reilly, James B. Reilly, Roberts, Miles Ross, Sobieski Ross, Salyer, Schleicher, Schumaker, Sheakley, Stanton, Stephens, Stone, Thomas, Washington Townsend, Charles C. B. Walker, Gilbert C. Walker, Alexander S. Wallace, Walling, Walsh, Warren, Watterson, Wheeler, Whitehouse, Wigginton, Andrew Williams, James Williams, Benjamin Wilson, Woodburn, and Young—93.

So (two-thirds not having voted in favor thereof) the rules were not suspended.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ASHE. I rise to make a motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. WELLS,] instead of moving to adjourn, will move that the House go into Committee of the Whole on the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. ASHE. I ask the gentleman from Missouri not to insist on his motion until I have obtained the sense of the House on the motion to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WELLS] moves that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the gentleman will change that motion to let us proceed to the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Missouri changes his motion the Chair will recognize the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. ASHE.] The Chair would state to the gentleman from Indiana that, having recognized the gentleman from North Carolina for a motion to suspend the rules, he is compelled to recognize the gentleman from Missouri to make the motion to adjourn, which is not debatable. But the gentleman from Indiana can see that it would be unjust to the gentleman from North Carolina if under those circumstances the Chair were to recognize the gentleman from Missouri to make another motion.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is manifest; but in the interest of public business I hope the gentleman from Missouri will withdraw his motion to adjourn and renew it after the gentleman from North Carolina has been heard.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. I withdraw for the present the motion to adjourn.

REFUND TO NORTH CAROLINA.

Mr. ASHE. I have not occupied the time of the House very much, and I do not expect to trouble it much more up to the 4th of March. But I desire the action of the House on a bill in which my State is deeply interested, which has been reported by the Committee of Claims favorably and which now stands on the Calendar. I move that the rules be suspended and that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1146) to refund to the State of North Carolina certain moneys therein named, and that it be brought before the House for action at this time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. ASHE] moves to suspend the rules for the purpose of considering this bill, it being a motion to discharge the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill.

The bill was read.

Mr. ASHE. I now ask that the report be read.

Mr. HURLBUT. I object to the reading of the report; it is not necessary; we have heard the bill read. It is in the nature of debate.

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry; is not this a motion to suspend the rules?

The SPEAKER. It is a motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

Mr. ASHE. I ask that the report be read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objected to the reading.

Mr. YEATES. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I want to ask if this report is a unanimous one?

The SPEAKER. That is not a point of order.

Mr. YEATES. I did not rise to a point of order, but I wished to make a parliamentary inquiry. I want to be informed whether this report is unanimous?

The SPEAKER. That is hardly a parliamentary inquiry, but the Chair will try to find out that fact for the information of the gentleman from North Carolina, if there be no objection.

Mr. PAGE. I object.

Mr. YEATES. Well, I will state that I am informed that it is a unanimous report. [Laughter.]

The question was taken on Mr. ASHE's motion; and on a division there were—ayes 76, noes 79.

So (two-thirds not voting in favor thereof) the rules were not suspended.

Mr. ASHE. I ask unanimous consent that the report accompanying the bill may be read. I am sure if the House could hear the report they would pass the bill.

Mr. HOSKINS, Mr. HURLBUT, and other members objected.

Mr. KNOTT. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Pending that motion the Chair desires to lay before the House a communication from the President of the United States.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman from Kentucky will not press his motion. There is ample time to dispose of the Indian appropriation bill this evening, and it is very important that the bill should pass.

EMPLOYMENT OF TROOPS IN SOUTHERN STATES.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky has waived his motion until the message from the President can be read, and the Clerk will now read that message.

The Clerk read the message, as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

On the 9th day of December, 1876, the following resolution of the House of Representatives was received, namely:

"Resolved, That the President be requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to transmit to this House copies of any and all orders or directions emanating from him or from either of the Executive Departments of the Government to any military commander or civil officer, with reference to the service of the Army, or any portion thereof, in the States of Virginia, South Carolina, Louisiana, and Florida, since the 1st of August last, together with reports by telegraph or otherwise from either or any of said military commanders or civil officers."

It was immediately or soon thereafter referred to the Secretary of War and the Attorney-General, the custodians of all retained copies of "orders or directions" given by the executive department of the Government covered by the above inquiry, together with all information upon which such "orders or directions" were given.

The information, it will be observed, is voluminous, and, with the limited clerical force in the Department of Justice, has consumed the time up to the present. Many of the communications accompanying this have been already made public in connection with messages heretofore sent to Congress. This class of information includes the important documents received from the governor of South Carolina, and sent to Congress with my message on the subject of the Hamburgh massacre; also the documents accompanying my response to the resolution of the House of Representatives in regard to the soldiers stationed at Petersburgh.

There have also come to me and to the Department of Justice, from time to time, other earnest written communications from persons holding public trusts and from others residing in the South, some of which I append hereto as bearing upon the precarious condition of the public peace in those States. These communications I have reason to regard as made by respectable and responsible men. Many of them deprecate the publication of their names as involving danger to them personally.

The reports heretofore made by committees of Congress of the results of their inquiries in Mississippi and in Louisiana, and the newspapers of several States recommending "the Mississippi plan," have also furnished important data for estimating the danger to the public peace and order in those States.

It is enough to say that these different kinds and sources of evidence have left no doubt whatever in my mind that intimidation has been used, and actual violence, to an extent requiring the aid of the United States Government, where it was practicable to furnish such aid, in South Carolina, in Florida, and in Louisiana, as well as in Mississippi, in Alabama, and in Georgia.

The troops of the United States have been but sparingly used, and in no case so as to interfere with the free exercise of the right of suffrage. Very few troops were available for the purpose of preventing or suppressing the violence and intimidation existing in the States above named. In no case, except that of South Carolina, was the number of soldiers in any State increased in anticipation of the election, saving that twenty-four men and an officer were sent from Fort Foote to Petersburgh, Virginia, where disturbances were threatened prior to the election.

No troops were stationed at the voting-places. In Florida and in Louisiana, respectively, the small number of soldiers already in the said States were stationed at such points in each State as were most threatened with violence, where they might be available as a posse for the officer whose duty it was to preserve the peace and prevent intimidation of voters. Such a disposition of the troops seemed to me reasonable and justified by law and precedent, while its omission would have been inconsistent with the constitutional duty of the President of the United States "to take care that the laws be faithfully executed." The statute expressly forbids the bringing of troops to the polls, "except where it is necessary to keep the peace," implying that to keep the peace it may be done. But this even, so far as I am advised, has not in any case been done. The stationing of a company or part of a company in the vicinity, where they would be available to prevent riot, has been the only use made of troops prior to and at the time of the elections. Where so stationed, they could be called in an emergency requiring it by a marshal or deputy marshal as a posse to aid in suppressing unlawful violence. The evidence which has come to me has left me no ground to doubt that if there had been more military force available it would have been my duty to have disposed of it in several States with a view to the prevention of the violence and intimidation which have undoubtedly contributed to the defeat of the election law in Mississippi, Alabama, and Georgia, as well as in South Carolina, Louisiana, and Florida.

By article 4, section 4, of the Constitution, "The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion, and on application of the Legislature, or of the executive, (when the Legislature cannot be convened,) against domestic violence."

By act of Congress (R. S. U. S., sections 1034-'5,) the President, in case of "insurrection in any State," or of "unlawful obstruction to the enforcement of the laws of the United States by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings," or whenever "domestic violence in any State so obstructs the execution of the laws thereof and of the United States as to deprive any portion of the people of such State" of their civil or political rights, is authorized to employ such parts of the land and naval forces as he may deem necessary to enforce the execution of the laws and preserve the peace, and sustain the authority of the State and of the United States. Acting under this title (69) of the Revised Statutes, United States, I accompanied the sending of troops to South Carolina with a proclamation such as is therein prescribed.

The President is also authorized by act of Congress "to employ such part of the land or naval forces of the United States" * * * "as shall be necessary to prevent the violation and to enforce the due execution of the provisions" of title 24 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, for the protection of the civil rights of citizens, among which is the provision against conspiracies "to prevent by force, intimidation, or threat, any citizen who is lawfully entitled to vote from giving his support or advocacy in a legal manner toward or in favor of the election of any lawfully qualified person as an elector for President or Vice-President, or as a member of Congress of the United States." (United States Revised Statutes, 1989.)

In cases falling under this title, I have not considered it necessary to issue a proclamation to precede or accompany the employment of such part of the Army as seemed to be necessary.

In case of insurrection against a State government or against the Government of the United States, a proclamation is appropriate. But in keeping the peace of the United States at an election at which members of Congress are elected, no such call from the State or proclamation by the President is prescribed by statute or required by precedent.

In the case of South Carolina, insurrection and domestic violence against the State government were clearly shown, and the application of the governor founded thereon was duly presented, and I could not deny his constitutional request without abandoning my duty as the Executive of the National Government.

The companies stationed in the other States have been employed to secure the better execution of the laws of the United States and to preserve the peace of the United States.

After the election had been had, and where violence was apprehended by which the returns from the counties and precincts might be destroyed, troops were ordered to the State of Florida, and those already in Louisiana were ordered to the points in greatest danger of violence.

I have not employed troops on slight occasions, nor in any case where it has not been necessary to the enforcement of the laws of the United States. In this I have been guided by the Constitution and the laws which have been enacted and the precedents which have been formed under it.

It has been necessary to employ troops occasionally to overcome resistance to the internal-revenue laws from the time of the resistance to the collection of the whisky tax in Pennsylvania, under Washington, to the present time.

In 1854, when it was apprehended that resistance would be made in Boston to the seizure and return to his master of a fugitive slave, the troops there stationed were employed to enforce the master's right under the Constitution, and troops stationed at New York were ordered to be in readiness to go to Boston if it should prove to be necessary.

In 1859, when John Brown, with a small number of men, made his attack upon Harper's Ferry, the President ordered United States troops to assist in the apprehension and suppression of him and his party without a formal call of the Legislature or governor of Virginia and without proclamation of the President.

Without citing further instances in which the Executive has exercised his power as Commander of the Army and Navy to prevent or suppress resistance to the laws of the United States or where he has exercised like authority in obedience to a call from a State to suppress insurrection, I desire to assure both Congress and the country that it has been my purpose to administer the executive powers of the Government fairly, and in no instance to disregard or transcend the limits of the Constitution.

U. S. GRANT.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, January 22, 1877.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution, upon which I demand the previous question, in connection with this message:

Resolved, That the message of the President, and the accompanying documents, in answer to the resolution of the House, calling for copies of all dispatches, orders, &c., relating to the use of troops in the States of Virginia, South Carolina, Louisiana, and Florida since the 1st August last, be referred to a select committee of eleven members, with instructions to report whether there has been any exercise of authority not warranted by the Constitution and laws of the United States in the use of the troops in the States referred to within the period stated, for which the President is justly responsible; with power to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, and to report at any time.

Mr. KASSON. I make the point of order that the resolution is not in order except under a motion to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. What is not in order?

Mr. KASSON. This resolution.

The SPEAKER. In what particular?

Mr. KASSON. Simply because it changes the rule, and on this day that is not in order as an original resolution.

Mr. HOLMAN. There is no rule bearing upon the subject.

The SPEAKER. The Chair reads from the Digest. The Constitution of the United States provides that the President shall from time to time communicate to Congress, &c.; and

All messages from the President are in writing, and are sent to the House by his Private Secretary. * * * Whenever taken up messages from the President are always read in extenso, the House never, as in the case of other communications, dispensing with the reading of the same.

Mr. HALE. I take it that the objection is to the motion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD,] who seeks now to create a new committee. Now, by what authority has he the floor, objection being made the moment the resolution was read, to bring that matter before the House? Of course these messages from the President are always received and read and take the natural course. But that a member can take advantage of that and introduce a motion that shall raise a new committee, is certainly an innovation. Now what right has the gentleman from New York to introduce this resolution?

The SPEAKER. The Chair, in accordance with the uniform practice, places before the House a message from the President of the United States. That message is read. The gentleman who introduced the resolution upon which that message was based is uniformly recognized, as the Chair well remembers, to make the motion to print and refer.

Mr. HALE. Yes; but to refer it to some ordinary committee of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the motion can be to refer the message either to a standing committee or to a special committee, and the motion to refer to a standing committee would have preference.

Mr. HALE. May any gentleman who has introduced a resolution of this kind, when the message in answer to it comes back to the House, take the floor and offer a resolution creating a new committee, just the same as he might take the floor to submit a motion to refer it to a standing committee of the House?

The SPEAKER. That would be a reference of the message. The Chair thinks it would be in order to move to refer this communication either to a standing committee or to a special committee. It is respectful to do so, and so far as the Chair recollects, it is the ordinary mode in reference to such communications. The Chair will listen to any gentleman who will indicate any instance when a different course of procedure was adopted.

Mr. KASSON. I beg the Chair to allow me to call his attention to this fact: the proposed resolution would not only create a new committee, but it would also give to that special committee powers to send for persons and papers. It therefore would constitute a new committee organization, differing from all the committees now existing under the rules. My point of order is that, even admitting that a motion to refer is in order to-day and may be carried by a majority vote, it is not in order to do anything for which the rules do not provide.

The SPEAKER. Then the Chair understands the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] to object to that portion of the resolution which proposes to give authority to this select committee to send for persons and papers.

Mr. KASSON. I object to that part of it, and I also raise the point that upon Monday no order can be taken except under a suspension of the rules. I agree with the Chair that it has often been the case that a message of the President has been referred to one of the ordinary standing committees without opposition; and to that no one would object in this case.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would call the attention of the gentleman to Rule 43:

> When a resolution shall be offered, or a motion made, to refer any subject, and different committees shall be proposed, the question shall be taken in the following order:
> The Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union; the Committee of the Whole House; a standing committee; a select committee.

Mr. KASSON. There is no question about the ordinary mode of procedure in the case of a reference. But this is an extraordinary mode of reference, as the Chair will see by reference to the resolution.

The SPEAKER. It is not extraordinary, because it is the last mode of reference mentioned in the rule to which the Chair has just referred. But the Chair would like to have any gentleman state if during his experience he recollects any procedure different from the one now indicated, in the case of a message.

Mr. KASSON. I recollect no case where a message has been referred to a select committee with all these special powers on a Monday, except under a suspension of the rules. As the Chair is aware and I think, as far as the Chair can recollect, a President's message is referred to some committee having jurisdiction of the subject involved in the message, referred in the ordinary way, and without objection. But this resolution proposes the creation of a new committee, with powers not conferred by the rules on any ordinary standing committee of the House. Those powers certainly are not within any provision of the existing rules.

The SPEAKER. Rule 43 clearly provides for a reference, and provides that the question shall be first taken upon referring to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, then to the Committee of the Whole House, then to a standing committee, and lastly to a select committee.

Mr. KASSON. If the Chair will permit me——

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. KASSON. Ordinary bills introduced into this House for reference are treated just as messages from the President. We have this morning been introducing bills and they have been referred to their appropriate committees. The present ruling of the Chair would authorize any member when he introduces a bill to move its reference to a select committee, leaving to any other member only the right to call for the question first upon its reference to a standing committee.

The SPEAKER. That has been frequently done.

Mr. KASSON. Not on Monday.

The SPEAKER. That choice has been given on Monday in regard to standing committees.

Mr. KASSON. Yes, with regard to standing committees; or if there be a select committee already appointed it could be referred to that committee. But this resolution proposes to provide for something which is not now provided for by the rules.

Mr. BANKS. A part of this resolution is clearly not in order now, that part which proposes to give to this select committee, if appointed, the right to report at any time; that portion of the resolution is certainly not in order. I agree with the Chair that it is competent for the House to order a select committee, if it thinks proper to do so, but it is not competent for the House, without a suspension of the rules, to give to any committee leave to report a particular subject at any time, because that would supersede all other business before the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order that the part of the resolution to which the gentleman refers is not in order.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I will modify the resolution by striking out that part.

Mr. KASSON. And also the part giving these extraordinary powers to the proposed committee.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Rule 74 tells us what shall be the committees of the House. And after a select committee has been raised under a suspension of the rules, and a proposition of reference is brought before the House, Rule 43 indicates in what order the question shall be taken upon the question of reference. While there may be some doubt whether the resolution of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] to raise a select committee is now in order, I think there can be no doubt at all that it requires a suspension of the rules to give to that committee extraordinary powers, such as the power to send for persons and papers, to give those powers either to a standing committee or to a new committee about to be raised.

The SPEAKER. Does the Chair understand the gentleman to say that it is not now in order to move to refer this message to a special committee?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I think it would require a suspension of the rules at this time to create a special committee. But if a special committee is already in existence, having been authorized under a suspension of the rules, and it is proposed to refer a particular subject to that committee, the question would then come before the House as laid down in Rule 43, upon the reference of the subject first to a Committee of the Whole House, next to a standing committee, and then to the select committee already appointed.

The SPEAKER. This message comes before the House by consent of the House. Rule 43 clearly provides that motions for the reference of any matter shall be put in such order as therein stated: first, to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union; secondly, to the Committee of the Whole House; thirdly, to a standing committee; fourthly, to a select committee. Now, the Chair sustains the point of order made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS,] that to give this committee the right to report at any time can only be reached by a suspension of the rules. But the Chair thinks that it is competent for the House without such a suspension to make a reference to a select committee, and to say what shall be the powers of that committee.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to inquire whether the ruling of the Chair upon the point raised by the gentleman from Massachusetts does not embrace also the power to send for persons and papers? Is it not true that neither the power to report at any time nor the power to send for persons and papers can be given except by a suspension of the rules?

Mr. KASSON. It is in the nature of a special order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would state that the point of order raised by the gentleman from Massachusetts was simply as to the right to report at any time, and that point the Chair sustained.

Mr. KASSON. The Chair will remember that I raised the other point as to conferring extra powers.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman from Iowa as making that point, and in deciding it would remark that it has frequently happened in the House that standing committees have, by a majority vote, been authorized to send for persons and papers. The Chair therefore thinks it is competent to embrace in this proposition of reference such a power in regard to a select committee.

Mr. MONROE. I beg to ask a question for the sake of information. Does not the resolution or motion before the House include two propositions: one for reference and the other to constitute a new committee to which the matter shall be referred? These two propositions are quite distinct. I submit that the ordinary motion of reference as made in the House under the rules implies the existence of the committee to which it is proposed that the matter shall be referred. A proposition to constitute a new committee is a different proposition altogether. As I understand Rule 43 and as I remember the practice under it, the different kinds of committees named are supposed to be committees already in existence.

The SPEAKER. A select commitee might not be already in existence.

Mr. MONROE. But there are select committees in existence, and, according to my recollection of the rule and the practice under it, the power to refer to a select committee has regard to committees which have already been constituted. But the proposition to constitute a new committee is a different thing altogether. A simple motion to refer to a select committee is no doubt in order; but it must have reference to a committee already in existence. A proposition to appoint a new committee, it seems to me, can only be adopted under a suspension of the rules.

The SPEAKER. The language of the rule is general—"a select committee." It is not confined to committees already created.

Mr. MONROE. We have a dozen select committees already, to any one of which the matter may be referred.

The SPEAKER. Under parliamentary rule, a select committee expires at the end of a session of Congress; the appointment does not run through two sessions, as is the case with other committees, yet it has been uniformly held that the reference of any matter to a select committee that has expired has the effect to revive that committee, which is substantially the same as the creation of a new committee. The Chair rules that the resolution is in order.

Mr. KASSON. Including the new powers?

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I demand the previous question.

Mr. KASSON. Then I move to suspend the rules for the purpose of adopting the resolution which I send to the desk.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I do not yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KASSON. My motion I submit is, according to the rulings heretofore, a privileged one, which has the effect even to take a gentleman from the floor.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I have the floor on my motion. The gentleman from Iowa knows better than to suppose that he can take me from the floor in this way. I have demanded the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York demands the previous question.

Mr. KASSON. The Speaker has always ruled that a resolution requiring a suspension of the rules and a two-thirds vote takes priority on Monday over any other proposition, and will even take from the floor a gentleman who is advocating another proposition.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. That certainly does not apply to the reference of a President's message, which stands upon privileged ground. All these questions of order which gentlemen have raised upon the other side are frivolous, and not appropriate to this particular proposition. It has always been held without dispute that when a President's message is before the House it has the right to make a disposition of that message as a privileged question, upon grounds appertaining to the dignity and character of the quarter from which it emanates.

Mr. KASSON. That point I dispute.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. It will be conceded that I would have the right to move the reference of the communication to the Committee on Military Affairs. The only difference in this case is that I move to refer it to a select committee, and if in addition I propose to instruct the committee to make specific inquiry as to the facts alleged, it is clearly an appropriate part of such a motion.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. Speaker, I differ with some of my friends on the republican side of the House in regard to one question which has just been raised. I understand that it is within the power of any member to move to refer anything either to a general committee or to a committee created for the purpose, and that whenever a motion of reference is made it is in order for the member making the motion to move for the creation of a select committee to which the subject shall be referred.

But I do not understand that the rule is as stated by the honorable gentleman from New York. On the contrary, the President's message in the ordinary course of our rules takes its place on the Speaker's table, and can never be taken up, even to be read——

Mr. WOOD, of New York, rose.

Mr. HOAR. I will answer the gentleman's question in a moment if he will permit me to finish my sentence. And that message can never be taken up to be read without going to the Speaker's table, except by unanimous consent, unless the House shall proceed in order with the consideration of the business on the Speaker's table. The statement of Barclay in his Digest is this:

All messages from the President are in writing, and are sent to the House by his Private Secretary, or such other person as he may delegate, and, as in the case of messages from the Senate, are announced at the door by the Doorkeeper and handed to the Speaker, who places them upon his table, to be taken up whenever the House, under the fifty-fourth rule, shall go to the business thereon. In the case of the annual message, however, it is usually taken up, by unanimous consent, as soon as received.

Now, the House consented, by not objecting, to take up this message, and it is that point to which I wish to call attention, that it is before the House for reference; like any other business before the House for reference, it must give place on Monday to a motion to suspend the rules. The gentleman from New York, instead of moving its reference, might have taken the floor for an hour and he might have been followed by other gentlemen. All that proceeding is regulated by the rule. Of course, if the motion to suspend the rules be voted down, this matter is immediately revived again. The gentleman does not lose the actual advantage of position, because here he is with his motion before the House, and the House is to take up his motion and deal with it just as soon as the motion to suspend the rules is out of the way.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state to the gentleman from Massachusetts that he agrees fully with him as to the effect of the fifty-fourth rule. Before presenting this message, the Chair examined Rule 54, to see whether, under the terms of that rule, this message could be reached and read in any other way than by unanimous consent. He stated, therefore, that he asked unanimous consent to place before the House a message from the President of the United States.

The gentleman from Massachusetts will remember, too, that special orders are made under suspension of the rules. Unanimous consent, when given, is equivalent, according to various decisions heretofore made, to a suspension of the rules.

Mr. HOAR. No unanimous consent has been given, except to the presentation of the message and that it should be read.

The SPEAKER. The message is before the House therefore, in obedience to the unanimous consent of the House. That waived any right any member of the House had under Rule 54.

The Chair desires to read further as to the point raised by the gentleman from Iowa, that he has the right to take the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] off the floor by his motion to suspend the rules. That is the point now before the House. The Manual, page 207, states many cases when the motion to suspend the rules cannot be made. If the previous question were seconded and the main question ordered and the previous question were in operation, it will appear that the motion of the gentleman from Iowa could not be entertained.

The Chair reads further from the Manual, so the whole case may fully appear:

It is not in order to move a suspension of the rules while the House is acting under a suspension of the rules—Congressional Globe, 2, 27, pages 58, 142; 1, 31, page 1225—unless connected with the business immediately before the House—Journal, 2, 36, page 212—nor while considering a special order, it having been made under a suspension of the rules—Congressional Globe, 2, 29, pages 401, 439—(unless connected with the consideration of such special order;) nor while the previous question is operating.—(Journal, 2, 33, page 564.)

Pending a motion to suspend the rules, so as to take an immediate vote on a proposition, a motion for a recess is not in order.—(Journal, 2, 39, pages 572, 573.) This decision of the Speaker was sustained on appeal by the very decisive vote, by yeas and nays, of yeas 173, nays 4; and would seem to have settled the question that, pending a similar motion, dilatory motions, such as had been previously tolerated, would not be entertained hereafter.

Pending a motion to suspend the rules, the Speaker may entertain one motion that the House do now adjourn; but after the result thereon is announced, he shall not entertain any other dilatory motion till the vote is taken on suspension.—(Rule 161.)

Mr. KASSON. If the Chair will recollect the facts, he will find on Monday it has been uniformly held that a motion to suspend the rules, requiring two-thirds, takes precedence of even a motion to suspend the rules which requires a majority, as in the case of going into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

That has been, so far as I know, the uniform ruling for Monday; that these are privileged motions and will take any other motion out of consideration of the House.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Unless the House is already acting under a suspension of the rules.

Mr. KASSON. Yes; with that saving clause.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. There are two difficulties in the way of my friend from Iowa. The Speaker can dispose of the question of order. But I want to set the gentleman right as to two matters of fact. Where unanimous consent has been given to present a message of the President of the United States, pending the disposition of that question a motion to suspend the rules is clearly out of order.

Mr. KASSON. Allow me to answer that before the gentleman goes to the other point. The answer to that is: No unanimous consent was given for the introduction of a resolution on the subject. It was only to lay before the House the President's message; and allow me to add, at the usual time when the Speaker merely makes such announcements to the House pending a motion to adjourn, and when the House is not prepared to expect that laying the communication before the House will be followed by a motion for consideration of any kind——

Mr. WOOD, of New York. The gentleman must be aware of the fact that a message from the President of the United States is always disposed of before any other business.

Mr. KASSON. Not necessarily.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. And that it is proper and necessary to move its reference.

Mr. KASSON. On the contrary, without unanimous consent the message should have lain on the Speaker's table until at the suggestion of the Speaker or of some member the House agreed to go to the consideration of business on the Speaker's table.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. But in this case, although the rule requires this business to go to the Speaker's table, and a motion to go to business on the Speaker's table calls it up in order, yet, where the Speaker presents these communications by unanimous consent to the House, the rule requiring such a communication to go to the Speaker's table is thereby waived; and when it is presented to the House, the only question that can come before the House is what disposition can be made of it.

Mr. KASSON. It is disposed of when it is still left on the Speaker's table.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I demand the previous question on the adoption of my resolution as modified.

Mr. KASSON. I first ask the decision of the Chair on the point of order raised. I will remind the Chair what are the facts. I take the floor to offer a resolution for a suspension of the rules, which requires a two-thirds vote; and I remind the Chair that he, himself, as his predecessors have done, has always given preference to that kind of motion to suspend the rules, over even a motion to suspend the rules to go into Committee of the Whole on appropriation bills. On Monday he recognizes, owing to the character of the business of that day, a motion to suspend the rules requiring a two-thirds vote in preference to any other motion; as to-day, when the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WELLS] sought to suspend the rules to go into Committee of the Whole on an appropriation bill other gentlemen were recognized for motions which required a two-thirds vote, in preference. And such has been the uniform ruling.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the Speaker allow me to call his attention to page 207 of the Digest, where are stated all the cases in which it is not in order on Monday to move to suspend the rules:

It is not in order to move a suspension of the rules while the House is acting under a suspension of the rules, unless connected with the business immediately before the House, nor while considering a special order, it having been made under a suspension of the rules, [unless connected with the consideration of such special order,] nor while the previous question is operating.

Now there are three conditions under which it is not in order on Monday to move to suspend the rules. None of those three conditions now exist. We are not acting under a suspension of the rules. We are not acting under upon a special order made so by a suspension of the rules. We are not under the pendency of the previous question. And those are the only conditions named in the rules in which it is not in order to move a suspension of the rules. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] has moved to suspend the rules, and none of those three exceptional conditions exist His motion must clearly be in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has carefully in the brief time allowed him considered this subject, and is of opinion that it is competent for the gentleman from Iowa to take off the floor the gentleman from New York when he makes a motion to suspend the rules for a higher privilege. But the Chair will state to the gentleman from New York that the business on which he submitted a motion being introduced into the House, remains as unfinished business till the next session of the House, when it cannot be interfered with by a suspension of the rules.

Mr. BANKS. I think the decision of the Chair is right, except in the phraseology in which it is stated.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will correct his phraseology if the gentleman from Massachusetts will point out that it requires correction.

Mr. BANKS. I desire it to be corrected as a matter of precedent. The gentleman from New York has not now the floor. He made his motion and has taken his seat; and that gives the gentleman from Iowa his right as stated, a right to move to suspend the rules.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I wish to correct the gentleman from Massachusetts in his statement of facts. I have not taken my seat.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman from New York yielded nothing.

Mr. BANKS. The gentleman from New York certainly took his seat. At any rate, whenever the Chair submitted the motion the motion to suspend the rules was in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair so rules on Monday.

Mr. KASSON. In order that the Chair may not misunderstand the history of this matter, I will state that I rose immediately upon hearing the resolution read for information and objected to its introduction, and then the point of order was made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS.] The Chair sustained the point of order raised by the gentleman from Massachusetts, and I was not aware that the resolution had been re-introduced as amended.

The SPEAKER. The chair sustained that point of order, and then the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] withdrew that part of the resolution.

Mr. KASSON. It was not offered again, to my knowledge, but if it is pending, then I will offer the resolution under my right.

Mr. COX. I wish to inquire whether, if the House adjourns now, this matter will come up to-morrow as unfinished business?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it would.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Not unless the previous question is sustained upon it.

Mr. HALE. How could it be, unless the previous question was sustained upon it?

Mr. GARFIELD. It will come up as unfinished business on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. In reference to the points suggested by the gentleman from Iowa, the Chair desires to read under the head of "Unfinished Business" upon page 227 of the Digest:

> The consideration of the unfinished business in which the House may be engaged at an adjournment shall be resumed as soon as the Journal of the next day is read, and at the same time each day thereafter until disposed of; and if, from any cause, other business shall intervene, it shall be resumed as soon as such other business is disposed of. And the consideration of all other unfinished business shall be resumed whenever the class of business to which it belongs shall be in order under the rules.

Now the Chair rules that it was competent for the gentleman on to-day to make a motion of a higher privilege, and that is to suspend the rules by a two-thirds vote, but as soon as that motion was disposed of then this matter comes up as the unfinished business immediately after that motion is disposed of.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I do not desire to impeach that, but I would call the attention of the Chair to the last clause of the paragraph which he has just read:

> And the consideration of all other unfinished business shall be resumed whenever the class of business to which it belongs shall be in order under the rules.—Rule 56.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa will see that under such construction of the rule as he indicates there never could or would be any reference made or disposition made of this executive message. A motion of higher privilege having been exhausted, which was to suspend the rules on Monday, then the gentleman from New York was recognized in his right to move the previous question.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Yes, if somebody else does not also move to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has already stated that it is in the power of members by continuously making motions to suspend the rules to keep the gentleman off the floor on to-day, but that this will come up as unfinished business then, and the Chair is bound to recognize the gentleman from New York to demand the previous question. Otherwise the business before the House, which in this case is the President's message, would never have any reference, which would be disrespectful and contrary to practice.

Mr. KASSON. I offer the resolution as reported by the Judiciary Committee through its chairman.

Mr. COX. Is it in order to move to adjourn now?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. COX. Then I make that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

And accordingly (at four o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By the SPEAKER: Resolutions of the Board of Trade of Chicago, communicated by telegraph, indorsing the report of the joint committee on counting the electoral vote, to the joint committee on counting the electoral vote for President and Vice-President.

By Mr. ADAMS: The petition of C. P. Williams and others, bankers, of Albany, New York, for relief from burdensome taxation, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. BLAIR: The petition of T. A. Gleason and 68 others, citizens of Cornish, New Hampshire, for cheap telegraphy, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. BURLEIGH: The petition of O. M. and D. W. Nash and 25 others, of Portland, Maine, for the repeal of the excessive tax imposed on national banks, to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee: The petition of citizens of Tennessee, for cheap telegraphy, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. CUTLER: Protest of citizens of Hawthorne, NewJersey, against the assumption by the President of the Senate of the power of counting the electoral vote, to the committee on counting the electoral vote.

Also, the petition of W. W. James, J. M. Barker, and other citizens, of Bristol, Tennessee, for a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. CRAPO: The petition of Benjamin Reiply, for the payment of awards made in his favor by the United States and Mexican mixed claims commission, to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. FINLEY: The petition of citizens of Saint Augustine, Florida, for an appropriation for cleaning out the harbor at Saint Augustine, and for the construction of a mole or wharf for the use of the Government, to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. FREEMAN: The petition of Barbara Arrison, that the act of February 14, 1871, granting pensions to the soldiers of the war of 1812, or their widows, be extended so as to include the widows of all the soldiers of said war regardless of the date of marriage, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. GOODIN: The petition of citizens of Kansas, for the enforcement of the act of July 24, 1866, by appropriate legislation, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. HENKLE: The petition of William L. Riley, for compensation for work done on the grounds of the Smithsonian Institution, to the Committee on Appropriations.

Also the petition of 2,586 citizens of the District of Columbia, for the passage of an act continuing the public schools of the District of Columbia for the full scholastic year of ten months, to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

By Mr. KIDDER: The petition of E. S. Wenckebach, late captain Twenty-second Infantry, United States Army, to be restored to his rank and position in the Army, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. KIMBALL: Memorial of Constantine Connerwaif, of Green Bay, Wisconsin, for compensation for military services rendered the government of Mexico, to the Committee of Claims.

Also, the petition of D. R. Bean and 54 citizens of Wisconsin, for cheap telegraphy, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Also, the petition of D. W. Woodward and 48 citizens of Wisconsin, of similar import, to the same committee.

By Mr. LUTTRELL: The petition of Phineas Banning and others, of Los Angeles, California, for the passage of the bill (S. No. 805) relating to indemnity lands, to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, the petition of A. W. Potts and others, of Los Angeles, California, exposing an alleged attempt at fraud on members of Congress for the purpose of defeating Senate bill No. 805 and House bill No. 3664, and asking for the passage of said bills, to the same committee.

Also, a letter from the Commissioner of Pensions, concerning the petition of Dovey Pace for arrears of pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. WALSH: The petition of Conrad Dulfer and other soldiers of the late war, to change the law so as to allow pensioners to receive pensions from the date of their discharge, to the same committee.

By Mr. WIGGINTON: The petition of A. J. Gillette and 62 others, for a post-route to connect the China post-office on route 46135 with the Temescal post-office, San Bernardino County, California, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Also, the petition of F. M. Stone and 110 others, for a post-route from Soledad via Peach Tree and Slacks Cañon to Imusdale, Monterey County, California, to the same committee.

By Mr. WILSHIRE: The petition of William A. Britton, of Arkansas, to be paid $2,000.74 compensation for repairs made by him while United States marshal, upon a building used as a jail by the United States authorities, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, January 23, 1877.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 820) for the relief of the mission of Saint James, in Washington Territory, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

A bill (H. R. No. 4475) removing the political disabilities of Joel S. Kennard, of Savannah, Georgia; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4476) to provide for the appointment of an official short-hand reporter for the United States courts in and for the district of California.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, inviting attention to the terms of the act approved March 3, 1875, and recommending an appropriation of money in lieu of bonds to be paid to Captain J. B. Eads, on account of the construction of jetties, &c., to maintain the channel between the South Pass of the Mississippi River and the Gulf of Mexico; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a petition of H. Luhre and 25 other citizens of Lavernia, Texas, praying that telegraphic business be transferred to the superintendence of the Post-Office Department and for cheaper telegraphic facilities; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. PADDOCK presented a petition of citizens of Fremont, Nebraska, praying for the repeal of the law imposing a tax on the deposits, circulation, and capital of banks; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WITHERS presented the petition of Mrs. Jane Dulany, widow of the late Colonel William Dulany, praying to be allowed arrears of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WALLACE presented a memorial of A. E. Borie, John Welsh, John C. Bullitt, and other leading citizens of Philadelphia, without distinction of party, praying for the passage of the electoral-count bill; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the petition of George Shiras, jr., John H. Shoenberger, John B. Guthrie, Malcolm Hay, Thomas M. Marshall, and other leading citizens of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, without distinction of party, praying for the passage of the electoral-count bill; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the petition of leading citizens of Wyoming County, Pennsylvania, praying for an amicable adjustment of presidential difficulties; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hold in my hand the proceedings of a meeting of the Merchants' Exchange of the city of Saint Louis, held yesterday, January 22, 1877, at which were introduced a preamble and resolutions by Ex-Lieutenant-Governor E. O. Stanard, of that State, and which passed the meeting with but one dissenting voice. The Merchants' Exchange of Saint Louis is composed of over two thousand members, embracing in that membership men of capital, men of intelligence, men of patriotism and devotion to their country, men who control the commercial interests of the great Mississippi Valley, men who belong to all the different political organizations known in our country. I will read the preamble and resolutions:

Whereas the Merchants Exchange of Saint Louis, an organization for strictly commercial purposes, embracing a membership of nearly two thousand, engaged in nearly all the commercial and financial pursuits of this trade center, have viewed with solicitude and alarm the recent political complications of the country and felt their disastrous effects on her commerce and on that of our city;

And whereas we rejoice at the results of the deliberations of the joint committee of the Senate and House of Representatives, and believe the plan reported by them to be the best available one for the solution of our presidential complications: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That we approve of the provisions of the bill reported to Congress by said joint committee and urge upon our Senators and Members of the House of Representatives a hearty support of the same.

I move that the memorial lie upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BURNSIDE presented the petition of J. B. Taylor, D. W. Kelsey, and other citizens of Manlius, Onondaga County, New York, praying for a general law to prohibit the liquor traffic within the national domain; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I present thirteen petitions of citizens of New Jersey, praying for the passage of some bill by which the present presidential contest shall be justly and promptly decided. I may say with reference to these petitioners that they consist of members of both political parties; that they represent all the interests that New Jersey has; that they are citizens of high standing, and that their prayer should be promptly and reasonably considered. I move that the petitions lie upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALCORN presented a memorial of the executive committee of the Mexican war veterans of the State of Mississippi in favor of the passage of a law granting pensions to the soldiers of the Mexican war to date from the time of their enlistment; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WINDOM presented a petition of citizens of Minnesota, praying that the telegraphic business may be transferred to the superintendence of the Post-Office Department and for cheaper telegraphic facilities; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. WADLEIGH presented the petition of Osborn Stanley, Pleasant Coppock, and other citizens of Ohio, praying for the prohibition of the manufacture and sale of alcoholic liquors in the District of Columbia and the Territories; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. KERNAN presented the petition of William and William H. Lewis, praying for an extension of their letters-patent for photographic plate-holder; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. INGALLS presented the petition of H. M. Metcalf, Thomas Prunty, W. Rucker, and numerous other citizens of Nemaha County, Kansas, praying for the passage of a law to enforce the provisions of the act of Congress of July 24, 1866, relating to the purchase by the Government of all the telegraph lines, property, and effects of any and all companies acting under the provisions of said act; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. EDMUNDS presented the petition of Clara Lyon Peters, Hannah Coffee, L. F. Sawyer, and others—240 men and 339 women—579 citizens of the State of Illinois, praying for a sixteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibiting the several States from disfranchising United States citizens on account of sex; which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SPENCER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4258) to provide for the payment for certain improvements on lands now embraced in the military reservation of Fort Cameron in the Territory of Utah, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Leopold Kaspeles, late of Company E, Fifty-seventh Regiment Massachusetts Volunteers, praying for the passage of a law granting him a balance of bounty claimed to be due him upon his discharge from the United States service, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2606) for the relief of Catherine Harris, reported it without amendment and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Peter P. G. Hall, of Pennsylvania, paymaster of the United States Army, praying that he may be refunded money he was obliged to pay in consequence of the embezzlement of a clerk, submitted a report thereon accompanied by a bill (S. No. 1175) granting relief to Major P. P. G. Hall, a paymaster of the United States Army.

The bill was read twice by its title, and the report was ordered to be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. KERNAN (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1176) authorizing William Lewis and William H. Lewis to make application to the Commissioner of Patents for the extension of their patents for new and useful photographic plate-holders; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. KERNAN. At the request of a citizen of the State of New York, I ask leave to introduce a bill relating to the revision of the statutes. I have not examined it myself.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 1177) to correct the revision of the statutes of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws of the United States.

Mr. WITHERS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1178) granting a pension to Francis A. Liebschutz, late of Company K, Ninth Kansas Cavalry, brevet first lieutenant United States Volunteers; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SPENCER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1179) providing for the care and punishment of vagrants, drunkards, idlers, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. SPENCER. I desire to state that this bill was sent to me by the commissioners of the District of Columbia. I move that it be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CHAFFEE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1180) to authorize the President to restore Samuel M. Robbins to his former rank in the Army; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BARNUM asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1181) for the relief of Thomas A. Weston; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. WRIGHT (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1182) for the relief of the Louisville Transfer Company of Louisville, Kentucky, and the Cincinnati Transfer Company of Cincinnati, Ohio; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. INGALLS asked, and by unanimon sconsent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1183) granting a pension to Harriet Moss; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

OFFICERS OF THIRD ARTILLERY.

Mr. COCKRELL. If the morning business is through, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2461) for the relief of certain officers of the Third United States Artillery who suffered by fire at Fort Hamilton, New York Harbor, on the 3d of March, 1875.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to settle with the first lieutenants of the Third United States Artillery who lost their personal effects by fire at Fort Hamilton, New York Harbor, on the 3d of March, 1875, at a sum not to exceed $600 each.

Mr. WITHERS. I should like to hear the report read in that case. The bill seems to contain a point that I think objectionable.

Mr. SPENCER. There are two reports, a Senate report and a House report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report of the committee will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. SPENCER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, January 18:

It appears that a fire originated from a defective flue in one of the casemates of Fort Hamilton, New York Harbor, March 3, 1875; that owing to the necessity for the services of all the officers and men of the garrison in removing a large quantity of powder from a casemate near the fire, all their private quarters in the casemates, and their effects therein, were neglected and allowed to be destroyed.

It seems to be just that these officers should be re-imbursed for their losses; but this should not pass into precedent, so as to prevent Congress from deciding any other analogous case entirely on its own merits. The committee therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying House bill, (H. R. No. 2461.)

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PROTECTION OF PROPERTY IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. SPENCER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4041) to prevent depredations upon property in the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that every person who, in the District of Columbia, shall willfully and without color of right enter into any occupied or unoccupied dwelling-house or other building, the property of another, and shall cut, break, or tear from its place any gas-pipe, water-pipe, door-bell, or other fixture therein; or who shall, in such dwelling-house or other building, cut, break, or tear down any wall, or part of a wall, or door, with intent to cut, break, or tear from its place any pipe or fixture therein, shall, for the first offense, be fined not more than $200 and be imprisoned in the District jail not less than two months or more than one year, and for any subsequent offense shall be imprisoned in the penitentiary for not less than one year or more than three years.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to have the Senator in charge of the bill state what is the present punishment for that offense.

Mr. SPENCER. There is a letter from the attorney of the District which states the necessity of the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear it read.

Mr. SPENCER. There is no law at all by which they can be punished.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No law to punish breaking into a house and stealing gas-pipes!

Mr. SPENCER. I ask that the letter be reported which is with the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter will be sent for.

Mr. SPENCER. The letter accompanies the bill in the shape of a report. [A pause.] I think there will be no objection to the bill and it is unnecessary to wait for the letter of the attorney of the District.

Mr. WHYTE. I should think that the bill ought to go to the Committee on the Judiciary. This is an important bill, relating to the exercise of criminal jurisdiction in the District. It is evidently a bill such as in some of the States is passed for the purpose of punishing persons guilty of maliciously destroying property, and it ought to be prepared with proper care under the Judiciary Committee. I hope, therefore, it will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SPENCER. I wish to state that this bill has passed the House of Representatives, having been drawn by the attorney of the District of Columbia and been recommended by the District commissioners. There is a letter showing the necessity of it from the attorney of the District, Mr. Birney, which states that there is no law punishing such offenses, but that the crime is only a trespass.

Mr. WHYTE. I have no doubt the bill was drawn by the attorney for the District, but it ought to be submitted to the Judiciary Committee, which has charge of such matters. It being a bill to punish for crime, the crime ought to be defined with judicial exactness. Therefore I hope it will be referred to the Judiciary Committee that they may first pass upon it before we adopt it as a law.

Mr. SPENCER. I ask that the letter of the attorney be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

ATTORNEY'S OFFICE, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, January 12, 1877.

GENTLEMEN: The bill No. 4041 House of Representatives, passed January 6, 1877, is necessary for the protection of fixtures in the houses in this District. The business of stripping houses, unoccupied for the moment, of the water-pipes, gas-pipes, and fixtures, bells, stop-cocks, range-castings, bath-tub linings, has been so steadily prosecuted in this District as to have depreciated the value of house property. A house can hardly be left over night without a guard. The depredators have frequently escaped through technicalities of the law against larceny.

I trust that the bill will have your recommendation.

Very respectfully,

W. BIRNEY,
Attorney, District of Columbia.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the bill read again.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. WHYTE. One of the most material words in the State statute is left out, "maliciously." A man may do that ignorantly, may commit that offense without any malice, and yet be punished for it. He may go in under a misapprehension, ordered by the owner to go in and tear down a pipe or alter some of the water-fixtures; and though the party so ordered may innocently do it, yet under the provisions of the bill, the word "maliciously" being left out, he may be punished for it.

Mr. SPENCER. I move to amend by inserting the words "willfully and maliciously" to meet the objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WHYTE. Now I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. It has been manifested now that it is not a proper bill to pass without fair examination. I move that it be referred to the Committe on the Judiciary.

Mr. DAWES. I hope that motion will prevail, I think if for no other reason, that the minimum of the penalty should be stricken out. I do not know what the policy of the law in the District of Columbia is; but it has come to be the policy in the States of late, and a very wise policy, I think, that the minimum of such punishment should be stricken out. I can conceive of the offense being committed under circumstances that would make that minimum penalty very severe. I hope, therefore, that the motion of the Senator from Maryland will prevail, and that among other things the minimum of the penalty will be stricken out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

COUNTING OF THE ELECTORAL VOTES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business the morning hour has expired, and the Chair will call up the unfinished business, which is the bill (S. No. 1153) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, when the committee was appointed by both Houses to take into consideration the count of the electoral vote, I expected as a matter of course, in case that committee agreed, to vote for its report. I have a high respect for the committee, for its members and its organization; and I supposed that any bill that it would be likely to agree upon and report would receive my hearty concurrence. And, sir, it is a painful thing to me to dissent from gentlemen whose opinion I esteem so highly; but, after the brief consideration I have had an opportunity to give to this bill, it becomes my duty.

I appreciate the honorable motives which led them to make this report, but it is equally my duty to act upon my judgment on the responsibilities of my position and to dissent from them if in my judgment they have fallen into error.

I know that when there is a strong pressure, a patriotic motive for an agreement in a committee of gentlemen who go over a subject of this kind, they may lose sight of objections which may influence the minds of others. Therefore in dissenting and, as I shall, criticising the work of this committee, I must in the outset express for the committee, their motives, and their purposes my sincere respect.

The bill before us is a bill to decide a case. It is not a general law, applicable to all time and for all similar occasions. It is designed to settle a case now made up and pending in your archives. Nor is it a bill to confer jurisdiction on an existing court to decide cases to arise. It is a bill to create a court to decide a case already made up. No one would propose this bill as a permanent measure of legislation. There are provisions in it that are incompatible with the conditions of a permanent law; and therefore it is a bill to constitute a court to try a cause already made up. It demands therefore the utmost scrutiny. Legislators in framing such a law must necessarily know the facts and the legal principles involved in the case to be tried. I could quote you from elementary authors to show you that such laws are of evil example, often resorted to in State Legislatures to accomplish corrupt purposes for private ends. No such pretense is claimed here; but the very nature of this bill compels us, in the exercise of our sworn duty, to examine it with care and scrutiny to ascertain whether or not the court that is created for this particular case can be justified by the general principles which govern our legislation.

This case turns upon a few brief words in the Constitution. In article 12 of the amendments to the Constitution are these words:

> The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted.

It must be observed that the only persons whose presence is provided for by the Constitution are the President of the Senate, the Senate, and the House of Representatives. This clause has been the subject of much debate of late years. I have here a volume printed by order of the House, and laid upon our tables, containing a great variety of opinions upon this subject expressed by many Senators here present, and by other Senators who have preceded us, from the foundation of the Government. The questions that have been discussed usually are four: First, shall the President of the Senate count the vote; second, can either House admit or exclude a vote; third, can both Houses concurring do so; fourth, can the Vice-President decide, if the two Houses disagree.

Upon these questions the opinions of most of the Senators present have already been given. This bill presents other questions quite distinct from those I have mentioned which it seems to me are of a more grave and serious character, some of them presented for the first time.

The committee have reported a bill which contains four propositions:

First. That the Vice-President has nothing to do with counting the votes except to preside and to state questions;

Second. That one House cannot reject a vote;

Third. That the two Houses by concurring votes may do so;

Fourth. That the grand commission organized by the bill shall decide all questions as to the vote of any State where there are two returns, and their decision shall be final unless overruled by the concurrence of both Houses.

I believe I have fairly stated these four propositions as contained in the bill. Now let us examine them in the reverse of the order in which they are mentioned:

First, as to the grand commission.

It is composed of five members of the Senate and five members of the House carefully organized so as to neutralize each other. It was known by this committee that one House was of one party, and the other House of the other; and, although it is not plainly printed on the face of the bill, yet I suppose every member of the committee will assent to it, that they looked to it that the commission so far as members of the Senate and House are concerned would be composed of an equal number from each political party: three democrats in the House, and two republicans; three republicans in the Senate, and two democrats. There is no provision of that kind, and yet it would be the natural inference from the ordinary mode of organizing committees; so that the members on the part of the House and the Senate neutralize each other. They are opposed to each other by political instincts in deciding questions involved in a political election. I do not say that they may not rise above all their party predilections and decide according to the law; but they are so organized with a view to neutralize each other, and leave the whole responsibility of this grave decision to stand upon the other members of the tribunal. To avoid any advantage the bill is so framed that each House will carefully watch the other until the commission is organized. Until then the right is reserved to either House to withdraw a member until the commission is organized, and then "hands off;" neither House has any power over the personnel of this commission.

The rest of the commission is to be composed of five judges to be selected in the manner I now read from the bill:

> On the Tuesday next preceding the first Thursday in February, A. D. 1877, or as soon thereafter as may be, the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States now assigned to the first, third, eighth, and ninth circuits, shall select, in such manner as a majority of them shall deem fit, another of the associate justices of said court, which five persons shall be members of said commission.

Four of those judges are named. Their names might as well have been printed in this paper; but that is not material, because they are defined by circuits as now organized by law. The Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] I believe, in his opening remarks, named these persons. He also alluded to the fact that they were well distributed throughout the United States, but it is plain upon the face of this bill that their geographical distribution had but little to do with their selection. If members were to be selected to represent geographical districts, it is not possible that the great State of New York and all that vast region lying between the Allegheny Mountains and the Mississippi River would be excluded from representation. No, sir; one in New England, one in Pennsylvania, one in Iowa, and one on the Pacific coast are selected by name really, so that there is nothing in this selection to represent geographical portions of the country. They were selected for their political opinions, and this we must concede in the outset.

The fifth controlling member is to be selected how? In such a manner as the majority of the four shall deem fit. Shall it be by a vote? Shall it be by ballot? Shall it be by viva voce? It may be by either, or it may be by lot, by chance, by a game of cards, by a throwing of the dice, by any of the forms of chance known to gamblers. We have introduced into this great commission, as the means of selecting the controlling member—the fifteenth member—the element of blind chance to decide this presidential election.

Sir, there are some other features about this game that make it very singular. From whom shall this umpire be chosen? In the first place the Chief-Justice is carefully excluded by the language of the bill. I do not know why this should be so. No doubt the committee had good reasons for it, but I do not know any nor have I heard of any. The choice, then, must fall upon one of the four associate justices not named. This one, who is to elect the President, must be selected by four judges; two from each party, and whom it is known will not agree, and these four grave judges must in some quiet game select and name the arbiter in whose hands will rest all the powers of the Senate and the House and of the States and the people in the selection of a President of the United States. Sir, I do not like the scheme. The popular mind will condemn it. I do not say that if the choice were between this mode of organization and civil war I might not be willing to resort to it; but as I will endeavor to show hereafter there is no such alternative, thanks be to God.

Mr. President, what will be the effect at once upon the Supreme Court when the members of that court are analyzed and scrutinized, held up and dissected before the face of the American people as to their tendencies, their political opinions, their personal affinities? Then all these men, the sacred judges of the highest court of the United States, instead of being, as now, removed by their long appointment and high character from political strife, instead of being set apart in dignified retirement to hold the scales of justice even and to represent all the power of one department of this Government, will be dragged into the political arena, their characters, their affinities, their associations, and their politics discussed and canvassed in the public press and in every cluster of political schemers. What will be the effect? Will not the profound respect with which we are wont to regard this high tribunal and each judge composing it be lowered, and this great conservative element of our system be weakened. It may be that we must seize upon this horn of the altar, this sacred branch of our Government, to rescue us from some great and perilous difficulty, but it seems to me it ought to be reserved for such a contingency, and not be called in to count an electoral vote already cast, every paper of which is in your urn and in your possession.

Mr. President, it must be remembered that this tribunal is not organized under the judicial clauses of the Constitution. There is no trouble in organizing a court under the judicial authority to try this very case. Article 3 provides that—

> The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish.
> * * * * * * *
> The judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity, arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority.

It is not pretended that this court is organized under this article of the Constitution, because if the court was so organized there would be no question that their appointment must be made by the President of the United States. A new tribunal may be made by Congress to try this very case. Tested by the judiciary article this tribunal would be plainly unconstitutional, but it is organized under the general authority of Congress to pass laws necessary to carry into execution any of the powers granted by the Constitution. It is based, by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] upon that residuary clause which enables Congress to provide machinery to carry into execution existing powers. The Supreme Court is thus divided and its judicial duties postponed not to perform other judicial acts but to share in a political act—that of counting in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives the electoral votes. This commission is organized, not as a judicial court under the judicial power, but as a political tribunal to witness a count, and to do whatever is necessary as a witness to that count.

Mr. President, the origin of this bill, so far as I can find in the records, is justly and properly traceable to my friend from Vermont. In one of the debates that occurred a year or two ago he shadowed this very proposition, but then the Supreme Court was not brought into the scheme. I find in debate that the Senator from Vermont especially pointed out very clearly on a former occasion that a case might be made on a disputed presidential election to be carried first to the circuit court of the United States and then, by appeal, to the Supreme Court of the United States. No doubt that could be done. Any person claiming to have been elected to the office of President, or any other office, might in the ordinary assertion of his right by judicial process carry his case, if the law so permitted, to the Supreme Court of the United States. There could be no difficulty whatever in providing a law which would authorize something in the nature of a political decision to be made here prima facie, to be re-examined by a summary proceeding and finally decided by the Supreme Court of the United States. There is no trouble in providing such a remedy as that. The honorable Senator from Vermont is better able to frame such a provision because he has himself suggested it in one or two of the speeches made in previous debates.

Mr. CONKLING. When the Senator says "proceeding here," does he mean a proceeding of Congress in the first instance?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think that a power semi-judicial might be conferred by law upon the presiding officer in the process of the count, which would give the basis of an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States; but I may be mistaken about that. At all events another court might be interposed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If I do not disturb the Senator by interruption, the Supreme Court have decided over and over again, so that it is now the settled law, that nothing can go to them for review except a decision of a judicial court in a case. So it would be out of the question to provide an appeal from the Vice-President or from anybody else in these Chambers to that court.

Mr. SHERMAN. That may be so; and if so it would be necessary to interpose a decision of a subordinate court, as for instance an authority might be conferred upon the supreme court of this District, exercising the powers and jurisdiction of a circuit court of the United States, and an appeal might be taken by a summary process to the Supreme Court of the United States. There is no trouble in that. It has been done in other cases involving public rights where an immediate or prompt decision was required.

Now, Mr. President, I come to examine whether the commission thus organized by this bill is in violation of the Constitution of the United States. I will read section 2, clause 2, of article 2. In defining the powers of the President, it provides:

> He shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and, by and with the advise and consent of the Senate, shall appoint embassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law; but the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments.

Five judges of the Supreme Court are taken by this bill to perform transcendent official duties. Are they officers of the United States? Is it necessary that their appointment should be made by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate? Has Congress power to appoint an officer, and thus violate and ignore the right of the President to appoint and the right of the Senate to confirm? Do you say that these are not officers, or being officers now, judges of the Supreme Court, they can be required to perform this ministerial duty? Why, sir, heretofore when officers of that high tribunal have been appointed to perform other official functions they have been nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate. Such was the case of Chief-Justice Jay, who, while Chief-Justice of the United States, was appointed minister plenipotentiary and envoy extraordinary to England; and his name was sent to the Senate and it was confirmed as such, although he was exercising another office.

And so, if any officer of the Government undertakes to perform the duties of another office, he must be appointed to that office by the President and must be confirmed by the Senate; and yet this bill takes five of the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, without such appointment, and transfers them to perform the highest official functions. It may be that I am wrong about this matter, and that this duty thus put upon these judges is an official duty, but I do not think so. These judges are not required to do this duty under any provision of the Constitution of the United States or any law giving jurisdiction. Their judicial authority is determined by the third article of the Constitution, and is defined by law. But this is a duty to be performed under the twelfth article of amendments, not of a judicial character. They are here appointed as officers to perform a ministerial duty. When thus appointed they must be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. The judges of the Supreme Court in this commission are not acting as a court, are not constituted under existing law. They are men composing a new tribunal. They can only be appointed to such commission by the President, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

If on the other hand it is claimed that this function is an inferior office, or a temporary office or the like and may fall within the power of appointment by the courts of law or the heads of Departments, the bill is equally unconstitutional, because this bill makes no provision whatever for their appointment by the head of a Department, or by a court of law. It is not the Supreme Court that selects this tribunal of five. Perhaps if they were regarded in the light of inferior officers, the power to appoint and select them might be conferred upon the court itself; but this power is not conferred upon the court. Four of them are taken by name and the fifth one is taken practically by lot, and the court as a court have no part or lot in the selection.

Now, as to what is an officer and as to whether these gentlemen when they take upon themselves the performance of this duty are officers, the committee no doubt have made up their minds. One trouble I am laboring under in this case is that the committee did not give us more fully than they have as yet their view of all these questions of law. They may have examined them; they may have answered them and may be able to remove these difficulties in the minds of the Senators, but they have not done it. Yesterday it seemed as if there was a disposition to force the bill through while members, not so well informed as they, were groping in darkness to satisfy their scruples on the subject.

As to who is an officer, I have a case here from my own State that arose under our constitution which provided that the election or appointment of all officers and the filling of all vacancies not otherwise provided for by the constitution was to be made in such manner as might be directed by law, "but no appointing power shall be exercised by the General Assembly except as prescribed in this constitution and in the election of United States Senators; and in those cases the votes shall be taken viva voce."

The Legislature of Ohio undertook to devise an ingenious mode of appointing the officers of the benevolent institutions so as to make them perpetual, first designating them by the Legislature indirectly and then allowing them to fill up the succession from time to time. The question came up before the supreme court as to the power of the General Assembly to thus practically appoint officers. These were mere administrators of charity, who received no pay. The question came before the supreme court, and I will read a brief extract from the decision as to what constitutes an officer, and whether even these comparatively insignificant managers of hospitals were officers within the meaning of the law.

Mr. THURMAN. What volume and page?

Mr. SHERMAN. Seventh Ohio State reports, page 556:

> The phrase "appointing power," as here used, is one of no ambiguous signification. When employed in reference to matters pertaining to government or to the distribution of the powers of government it means the power of appointment to office, the power to select and indicate by individuals to hold office and to discharge the duties and exercise the powers of officers. No man can possibly mistake its meaning in this respect, especially as office and the appointment and election of officers constitute the whole and the manifest subject-matter of this section of the constitution.
> * * * * * * * * *
>
> What is an office? Among lexicographers, Webster defines the word to signify "a special duty, trust, or charge, conferred by authority and for a public purpose."
>
> If we accept either or both of these definitions as substantially correct, it is clear to our minds that if these statutes are held valid these defendants are officers. Theirs is a public duty, charge, and trust, conferred by public authority, for public purposes of a very weighty and important character. Their duties, their charge, and trust are not transient, occasional, or incidental, but durable, permanent, and continuous.

Again:

> It is true, the General Assembly seems to have carefully avoided giving to the defendants any official name or designation.

Just as is done in this case.

> But surely this is immaterial to the question. The official or unofficial character of the defendants is to be determined, not by their name, nor by the presence or absence of an official designation, but by the nature of the functions devolved upon them. If the General Assembly had in terms enacted "that a board of commissioners of the appointing power, to consist of three members, be and is hereby constituted, and that William Kennon, Asahel Medbery, and William B. Caldwell be and hereby are respectively appointed to the office of member of such board"— then it would be clear that they were officers.

> But it is said, the acts referred to prescribe no oath of office, and it is thence inferred that the defendants cannot be officers.

But in this case there is an oath prescribed.

> Again, it is said, that no fees, salary, or other compensation, is annexed to the discharge of the duties devolved by statute upon these defendants. That is true; and it is also true that compensation to them hereafter is nowhere by these statutes prohibited or precluded.
>
> That compensation or emolument is a usual incident to office, is well known; but that it is a necessary element in the constitution of an office, is not true.—Ohio State Reports, The State ex rel. Attorney-General vs. Kennon et al., pages 556, 557, 558, 559.

These men thus required to perform comparatively unimportant duties in the State of Ohio under the constitution of that State, which denied to the General Assembly the power to appoint an officer no more strongly than the power is denied to the Congress of the United States, it was held were officers, and could not be appointed except in the way provided by the constitution of the State.

Now these judges are to exercise the very highest functions of office: they are to make a President. Judged by the ordinary motives that rule and govern mankind, the fifteenth man has the power to make a President, if he will use the powers conferred on him by one construction of this bill. I say that under these circumstances the members of this commission are officers under the law and the Constitution, and before they can be called upon to exercise their official functions they must be appointed in the mode prescribed by the Constitution.

But, sir, this bill is objectionable in another respect. It undertakes to delegate a power conferred upon Congress or upon either House to a commission. Its members are to take an oath in a prescribed form and cannot be disturbed by Congress or by either branch during the existence of the commission. They are to exercise the same powers possessed by either House, which include the power to send for persons and papers, to examine witnesses, and administer oaths. Their judgment is final unless reversed by the concurrent action of both Houses. This is a plain attempt by Congress to delegate its powers. Sir, it is an axiom of the law that legislative powers cannot be delegated. This general principle is laid down in Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, from which I will read a single extract:

> One of the settled maxims in constitutional law is that the power conferred upon the Legislature to make laws cannot be delegated by that department to any other body or authority. Where the sovereign power of the State has located the authority, there it must remain; and by the constitutional agency alone the laws must be made until the constitution itself is changed. The power to whose judgment, wisdom, and patriotism this high prerogative has been intrusted cannot relieve itself of the responsibility by choosing other agencies upon which the powers shall be devolved, nor can it substitute the judgment, wisdom, and patriotism of any other body for those to which alone the people have seen fit to confide this sovereign trust.

And in a note I find these general principles laid down:

> These are the bounds which the trust that is put in them by the society, and the law of God and nature, have set to the legislative power of every commonwealth, in all forms of government:
> First. They are to govern by promulgated established laws, not to be varied in particular cases, but to have one rule for rich and poor, for the favorite at court and the countryman at plow.

And yet this bill violates the first fundamental principle, which limits legislative power. This law does apply to a case past, concluded, ended, and now a special law is to be made to try that particular case by a special tribunal. I will read another passage:

> Fourthly. The legislative neither must nor can transfer the power of making laws to anybody else, or place it anywhere but where the people have.—Locke on Civil Government, section 142.

That legislative power cannot be delegated a large number of cases are quoted to show, and it is a familiar principle of law. If legislative power or the power to make laws cannot be delegated by either House of Congress, how can this power, which they claim gives them the authority to reject the vote of States, gives them the control over a presidential election, be delegated? This power, it is true, is merely a power drawn by inference from the duty to be present at a count; but however conferred, if it exists at all, it cannot be delegated. Sir, if there is slumbering in these few words "in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives" this enormous power to undo the work of the States and the people, and to revise and reverse their decision in the election of electors, then surely this power cannot be delegated to a packed tribunal.

There is another feature of this bill which seems to violate the Constitution, certainly to violate the spirit of it. The members of the Senate who are taken to form a part of this commission are not merely our instruments to inquire for us at our pleasure and our will, to be discharged at any moment; they are not merely our instruments, our agents, to take depositions and to examine bills, and to report to us amendments; but this bill makes them officers independent for the time being, while they are discharging their public duty, of either House of Congress.

Article 1, section 6, clause 2, of the Constitution provides that no Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office which has been created during such time. Here is an official trust of the highest character, not to be likened to an ordinary committee of this body, conferred upon members of this Congress. It is a commission uniting three branches of the Government, the Senate, the House of Representatives, and the Supreme Court, having the power to decide and not to be overruled by either House. They cannot be overruled by their own House. The Senators to whom we delegate this power have our power beyond our control. They are not our agents any longer; they are our superiors until this work is ended. I say they cannot be delegated to perform this enormous trust when that very trust has been created by the Congress of which they are still members and by their votes and participation.

If the appointment to such an office created during the term for which these members were elected does not fall within the strict prohibition of the Constitution, it certainly falls within the spirit of it. The duty they are called on to perform is not the mere ordinary duty which is transferred for a moment only to our committee, and which may be withdrawn at any time—for at any moment a motion can be made to withdraw any subject from any committee or to disband the committee and disorganize it. They are our creatures; but when we create this commission by law we delegate all our powers, whatever they are, over the electoral vote as the Senate of the United States to these five men, and those powers cannot be withdrawn. It may be that this power will not be abused; but if it is we stand helpless in the presence of our own creation unless the House will concur in a remedy.

Now, sir, I say it is against the spirit and policy of the Constitution to thus by our own law create such enormous powers and enormous duties, and invest them in our own members, placing them beyond our control; and it is an implied violation of that provision of the Constitution which prohibits a member of Congress from holding any office or being appointed to any office the salary of which has been raised during his term of service, or which has been created during his term.

Mr. President, I said yesterday that the judicial feature of this bill was novel. My honorable friend from Vermont, to whom I always defer as being very accurate, took issue with me at once. I will read what occurred between us yesterday:

> Mr. EDMUNDS. My honorable friend from Ohio made use of one expression in which I think he did not display his usual accuracy. He said that this bill was perfectly novel in its character.
>
> Mr. SHERMAN. In several of its provisions, I meant.
> Mr. EDMUNDS. It is only seventy-six years, as my friend from Ohio must well recollect as well as I do, that a bill involving exactly these principles passed the Senate of the United States, which provided that disputes of this character should be decided preliminarily, and I believe I may say finally—which goes much further than this bill does—by a body of men not composed entirely of the members of the two Houses.

Here my friend—and I did not contradict him at the moment, although I felt quite sure he was wrong—said that the Senate of the United States had once passed a bill that allowed members of the Supreme Court to participate in such a commission. I turned to the record and I found that he was mistaken. It is true that a committee recommended the passage of such a bill, but that feature was stricken out in the Senate and never proposed again and never heard of again in the House and abandoned. The whole history of this is contained in the book I have before me. I have the bill as it was reported from the committee. Section 1 provides—

> It shall be the duty of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States to choose, by ballot, in each House, six members thereof, and the twelve persons thus chosen, together with the Chief-Justice of the United States, or if he is absent from the seat of Government, or unable to attend, then with the next senior judge of the Supreme Court of the United States who is present and able to attend, shall form a grand committee, and shall have power to examine, and finally to decide, all disputes relating to the election of President and Vice-President of the United States.

That was the grand committee then proposed by the Senate committee, but the Senate struck out that feature which mingled the the Chief-Justice or one of the justices with this tribunal, and the bill as it passed the Senate contained these words:

> It shall be the duty of the Senate and House of Representatives to choose, by ballot, in each House, six members thereof. The Senate, immediately after this choice, shall nominate, by ballot, three of its members, and transmit their names to the House of Representatives, who shall, by ballot, choose one of the three, and the thirteen persons thus chosen shall form a grand committee, and shall have power to examine and finally to decide disputes relative to election of President and Vice-President of the United States as is hereinafter limited and prescribed.

So that the Senate there, at the very foundation of our Government, in 1800, seventy-six years ago, when this proposition was made by a committee, struck it out, and the bill went to the House, and no man in the House proposed to restore it. The House it is true adopted a different plan; they reduced the number of the committee and refused to allow the Senate to designate the presiding officer, but left the committee eight, giving each House an equal number, thus leaving them to choose their own presiding officer; so that it is entirely novel in our whole history to introduce the Supreme Court into this wholly political machine. My friend was in error, therefore, when he said the bill as reported passed the Senate, for in this particular it was amended and changed.

Mr. President, it is well known from the history of that bill that it fell by a difference on amendments between the two Houses. The question of the Chief-Justice was eliminated from it by the Senate, and never subsequently was brought into controversy. There were other controversies between the two Houses, and the bill fell. This was followed by the great historical event, when a portion of the people of the United States endeavored to thwart the will of the people in the election of Thomas Jefferson as President of the United States. By a provision of the Constitution as it then stood, the President and Vice-President were both voted for without designating which was to be President. The friends of Burr took advantage of that, well knowing that the people intended Jefferson to be President and Burr to be Vice-President, to try and make Burr President, and thus thwart the popular will. That was defeated; but the very conspiracy to which Burr lent himself led to the tragic fate which darkened a most brilliant life; and that name which in revolutionary history was honored, which in the early history of our country was among the most brilliant, was stricken from the roll of honor, and now is mentioned only second in infamy to that of Arnold. This controversy was the beginning of his downfall. Mark what followed. As soon as this controversy was ended by the election of Jefferson, at once they commenced to agitate a change in the Constitution so as to cure this defect in the original draught and to require the people to designate whom they wanted as President and whom as Vice-President. Remember, at this time the debate was fresh in the minds of all in which Mr. Pinckney made his famous speech from which I will hereafter read a portion. In this controversy the provision of the original Constitution for the election of a President, every word of it, was made the subject of debate; and in 1803 after the election was over a proposition was made in Congress to change the Constitution and after full consideration was adopted, and the twelfth amendment was passed and ratified by the States.

Was there any change then made in that provision which provided the mode of counting the vote? They changed the mode of designating the officer, but the same language in the old provision for counting the vote was carried into the new, and the words are in the new as in the old, that the presiding officer shall open the papers and in the presence of the Senate and House of Representative the vote shall be counted. If they thought that there was any danger lurking in these few simple words, would they not have provided against it? Surely they would; and if they wanted to graft into our body-politic the system of combining the Senate and House and Supreme Court into a grand high commission, as proposed three years before, do you not suppose they would have said so by fit words when proposing this twelfth amendment, only three years after the proposition was made? They were content with it as it was. And there the words stood; there they have stood to this day; and now the attempt is made to change all this, to seize the occasion of a close vote to manufacture a court to try a case already made, to change the old and simple habit of our fathers, under words twice repeated in the Constitution, readopted after fourteen years of trial, and acted on from that day to this by the common consent of all. And, sir, so it stood until the fatal troubles which grew out of our civil war. In 1865, when the condition of some of the Southern States was still uncertain and it was still disputed whether they had been restored to their old relations in the Union, then it was that Congress, without consideration, upon the report of the Judiciary Committee, without debate, adopted the twenty-second joint rule, which we have finally got rid of, thank God.

Mr. President, I do not know, perhaps my friend from Vermont can tell me, whether since 1800, when the Senate struck out the provision about the Chief-Justice, any proposition has been pending in either House to mingle the Supreme Court with the electoral count.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator if he did not vote ten months ago himself exactly for that proposition, to make the Chief-Justice one of the commission?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not remember.

Mr. EDMUNDS. He had better look at the record and see if he did.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will my friend point it out? In my judgment it was wrong if I did. I will here say to my honorable friend that if he will look over that book—it is a thing I very rarely do to quote the opinions of members in former debates—he will find that probably other people have changed their opinions as well as myself on important questions, as we sometimes do, and as I think a wise man often does.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope my honorable friend will pardon me for the interruption. I did not mean to accuse him of any inconsistency; but he said he had not known of the bringing in of the judicial branch at all since that time; and in order to correct the history of it I merely wished to call his attention to that important circumstance.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to the interruption. I am not as familiar with the votes on this question as my friend from Vermont, and therefore when I said I did not know of any proposition to renew the mingling of the Chief-Justice with this court I turned to my friend on my right [Mr. MORTON] to inquire if any was made, and my friend informed me that I was mistaken, and therefore I am. My colleague says I did not vote for it. So I was right, but if I am on trial I will refer that case to the joint commission. [Laughter.]

There is another notable thing, that when my friend from Vermont first gave birth here to this idea of a grand commission, which he said was drawn from the practice in his own State, he did not then propose to incorporate the Supreme Court or any part of it in his grand high commission. He said—I am not prepared to give dates; the book is not so printed that I can——

Mr. ALLISON. Eighteen hundred and seventy-three, I guess.

Mr. SHERMAN. Probably it was. It is page 482 of this compilation:

> That is, on each occasion of a presidential election the appointment of a committee to be named in each House, to be, if you please, equal in number, who should form a single and consolidated committee, the members of which, thus selected and appointed, would presumably be among the purest and best and most skillful in law and in politics of the members of the two Houses; that that body of people should be sworn to take the returns when they are opened by the Vice-President of the United States and canvass them, canvass them under the sanction of the Constitution and the law; that they should apply to them the same impartial considerations that they would be bound to apply to them had the Constitution declared that those eight persons should form a court who should finally determine every question.

He here develops the very idea that is contained in this bill. But there was no provision then for taking one-half of the Supreme Court of the United States to decide between two political bodies.

Mr. President, suppose these judges should refuse to perform their duty, how could you compel them? I do not say that men so eminent as they would refuse to comply with any request made by the Senate and House of Representatives; but you are dealing with parties over whom you have no control. You appoint them to a troublesome and painful duty without defining exactly their powers. What if they should decline? Then your scheme is at an end.

But, sir, suppose the commission organized and in full operation, what are they to do? When Florida is reached will they take the formal, official paper of Governor Stearns and the vote of the republican electors certified by him, or will they find out what the last decision of the last court in Florida held, or will they open the budget of my friend from California, [Mr. SARGENT,] who comes back here with ever so many volumes of testimony not yet printed? What are these men to do? No one can tell. What will they do in the case of Louisiana? Will they take the certified returns of Mr. Kellogg, who has been acknowedged now for years to be the governor of that State, and of the electors certified by him to have been elected according to the returns of the returning officers, and take that vote as final and conclusive, or will they open up the whole case and examine into the bull-dozed parishes to see whether or not the returning officers exercised their duty fairly? If so, you would have to call my friend from Missouri [Mr. BOGY] and myself—it seems we differ in opinion—and then you will have to call my friend from Wisconsin, [Mr. HOWE,] just returned from a more careful and critical examination, with two or three or four volumes of unprinted testimony. What are you to do? Is their jurisdiction limited or defined? Let us look at the bill. Here is this jurisdiction of this tribunal:

> Which shall proceed to consider the same with the same powers, if any, now possessed for that purpose by the two Houses acting separately or together, and by a majority of votes decide whether any and what votes from such State are the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States, and how many and what persons were duly appointed electors in such State, and may therein take into view such petitions, depositions, and other papers, if any, as shall, by the Constitution and now existing law, be competent and pertinent in such consideration.

Here you not only give them the right to do anything that either House may do; you invest them with all the powers which Congress can give them, and then you leave them to decide whether they will exercise any of these powers, or whether Congress can exercise any of these powers, and there is no appeal to either House from their decision. I want to know what is the construction this committee put upon the powers of the commission? Are they confined to the legal returns? Are they bound to take the votes of the electors as certified by the legal officers of these States? If not, the question is open. Why did not this committee in their report tell us what is their construction of this law? The grand commission are not only residuary legatees, but they are sole legatees, and they are sole judges of the extent of the bequest. My friend from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] made a very good speech yesterday. And, if that is the doctrine upon which this board are to act, I might be converted perhaps, although I think not. But what does my colleague [Mr. THURMAN] say? What does the honorable Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] say? What is their opinion of the powers and extent of the powers of this commission? When I hear them, perhaps I can tell better. I once had charge of a bill where the friends of it did not agree upon the meaning of a certain provision; but the courts were open in that case to decide it. But now the courts, and we ourselves, are foreclosed. That was denounced as a sham, a fraud, a cheat, simply because the friends of the measure could not tell exactly what construction to put upon it, or what construction the courts would put upon it. If that was a sham, what is this, when the question of these powers and the nature of the powers and the construction of the law is to be referred to a committee composed of three different and somewhat antagonistic elements?

Why, sir, are we to vote for this as a mode of counting the votes of States according to the laws of the States, or are we to vote for it as a scheme to permit the fifteenth member selected by lot to choose a President of the United States? Because that is it. If they count according to the legal vote returned, every man knows who is elected President without the appointment of this commission. If they are allowed to open the returns and go back of them and to inquire into the testimony of what occurred in the three or four disputed States, God only knows what will be the result. It will depend upon the die, the chance, the lot that will be cast when the fifth judge is named by his four associates. Sir, I do not believe we ought to vote for such a proposition. The committee have agreed upon the words of this bill, and I commend their agreement. They have labored faithfully and honestly, actuated by high motives and patriotic motives no doubt; but they have not agreed on the meaning of the bill.

Mr. THURMAN. Why do you say that?

Mr. SHERMAN. Because I say you have referred to this tribunal the whole question.

Mr. THURMAN. Then the meaning of the bill is clear.

Mr. SHERMAN. Can you tell me how they will decide?

Mr. THURMAN. No. If I could, I should not vote for the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. That shows that my criticism of this bill is perfectly correct. My colleague, no doubt, in construing the extent of the powers conferred on this commission, will give one view of it and my friend from New Jersey give the other. Perhaps if we could hear all these gentlemen tell us the inside meaning of these mysterious phrases, this jurisdictional clause, we might know how to vote better.

Mr. THURMAN. Will my colleague allow me a moment?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. THURMAN. Does he mean that the Senator from New Jersey and I are in antagonism on the point on which we are really not antagonistic? However much antagonism there might be between us, if we had the decision of this case or if we were so unfortunate as to be members of this commission, the Senator from New Jersey and every member of this committee will tell my colleague that this bill sends to that commission the decision of the questions of law as well as of fact, and there is no obscurity in the bill. How they will decide them no mortal man can tell.

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir; that will depend upon the lot in the office of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the choice of the fifth judge, in all probability, though it may not. There is the trouble; and we are asked to vote for this bill, which substitutes this chance for the votes of electors elected according to the laws of the States and returned upon the oaths of their office.

Mr. President, I will not press this matter further. Suppose this tribunal organized and at work, what assurance have you that they will or can complete it? You have a trial of thirty-eight cases, for there may be ineligible electors in many States, and if they decide that they can go into the eligibility of the electors, as a matter of course they may inquire into each in every State, although I suppose these inquiries would be decided by the two Houses, there not being two returns. When a State is called its vote must be settled before the next certificate is opened. That is another provision of this bill. When you have reached Florida, for instance, there you must stop and the high joint commission or the high commission take the case; they go into their room in secret conclave. How much have we heard lately about secret conclaves? Here the Constitution provides for an open scene and invites as witnesses the whole people of the United States.

At any moment that the touch-stone of this controversy comes, Florida being the first State reached, they go into their Chamber; there they debate and decide; and that is the end of it. Suppose that within the last two or three weeks, or a week even, the case of Florida, where the number of votes is comparatively small, is made up; but it takes some time. If they decide in one way, as a matter of course they will have to read this testimony, some of which has not been printed. But suppose they get along to the State of Louisiana and there the question comes up. Suppose they should decide there that they can go behind the returns. When can they decide that question; when can they read these papers? Although these judges are great men, high in official position, and the Senators and members who will be chosen to perform this duty will be among the best of our respective bodies, yet they must read, they must study, they must eat, they must sleep; and they cannot read the papers as a judge would have to read them in one view of the aspect of this controversy between now and the 4th day of March. While this process is going on, while they are finding out about the bull-dozing in Louisiana and examining into this or that matter about Louisiana, the votes of great States are uncounted. New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, and other States still stand in the urn awaiting their turn to be counted. Suppose that the excitement should grow stronger and stronger. Suppose that Florida were decided in one way and Louisiana the same and the case hung upon Cronin and Grover's trick. The excitement increases. The people are eager and anxious about what is going on in that room, because these cases must be decided and the vote of every State must be recorded before the final result is reached. You will have our people in a fever of excitement. In all human probability this controversy will be prolonged and delayed, and the whole may end without result from the very magnitude or immensity of the machinery set at work.

This very bill provides the machinery of delay. It authorizes this tribunal to pass rules and regulations. It authorizes a limited debate of two hours on every question that is raised in either the Senate or the House. The Senate may object, and it must then retire, and there are two hours allowed for debate. The House may object, and we retire to allow them to deliberate, and thus two hours may be wasted in debate on every question that is raised. The opportunity for delay endangers the final result of the count.

Mr. President, I have no doubt that the members of this commission will endeavor to do their full duty; but you impose upon them a duty which they cannot perform in one view of the possible construction they may give to their powers—duties which they cannot perform in the mode provided for within the time, before the 4th of March. What is the result of all this? You have substituted this cumbrous machinery for the simple process of a count twenty-two times repeated since the foundation of the Government. You provide this machinery now when the vote has been cast and the people have elected a President. You provide this machinery under the implied power drawn from your presence as witnesses to this count, and not from any express grant of the Constitution. You set this vast machinery in motion which may defeat the very count to secure which it is provided, and solely because you are witnesses to it. You have transferred to another tribunal your power, whatever it is, and you are helpless in their hand, because until they decide you can neither withdraw them from that duty nor hasten nor hurry them; you can do nothing except to repeal this law. You take from the one man selected by the Constitution as the custodian of these papers and substitute an unnamed man to be selected by lot, to have all his powers and all the powers of the Senate and House combined. You fear the power of one man who has to perform a duty in the open day with every gaze upon him, under the solemnity of an oath as sacred as these men take, in the presence of the Senate and the House and the assembled galleries. Every act that he does is watched with scrutinizing eye. You will not allow one man that power to open and count this vote in your presence, but you will select an unseen tribunal, the governing power of which is selected by chance, to do this same deed in secret conclave. You select a college of cardinals to elect a President.

You devise a guillotine to which you may be the first victim. You renounce the open, solemn spectacle of a man in the face of the world doing an act, in favor of a secret conclave of commissioners sitting in secret and deciding without appeal. You prohibit the purely ministerial count of the electors of the States and substitute a secret inquisition of undefined power so organized that the defection of one man may change a presidential election.

Suppose the high commission finish the case referred to them, and reject the vote of a State or of an elector of a State, then it deprives the State of its vote. Where is the clause of the Constitution that confers that power upon anybody? The Constitution declares that these electors shall be elected according to the laws of the State, and the certificate of an officer of the State is made by your law the evidence upon which all official acts depend. Again, your bill expressly provides that the Senate and House of Representatives may exclude the vote of a State. Here is that provision:

> And no electoral vote or votes from any State from which but one return has been received shall be rejected except by the affirmative vote of the two Houses.

That as a matter of course is equal to an affirmance that by the affirmative vote of the two Houses an electoral vote might be rejected. Another provision allows by a negative pregnant the two Houses by a concurring vote to exclude the vote of a State.

> The two Houses shall separately concur in ordering otherwise, in which case such concurrent order shall govern.

This provides expressly that the two Houses by concurring or agreeing may reject the electoral vote of a State. If such a power exists in Congress, then this concurrent vote must be submitted to the President for his approval. I repeat that this bill provides in two separate clauses that by the concurring votes of the two Houses the votes of a State or a single vote from a State may be excluded. Here is the provision of the Constitution:

> Every order, resolution, or vote to which the concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary (except on a question of adjournment) shall be presented to the President of the United States; and before the same shall take effect, shall be approved by him, or being disapproved by him, shall be repassed by two-thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives, according to the rules and limitations prescribed in the case of a bill.

Here is the expressed provision of the Constitution, that a concurrent vote of the two Houses on every occasion where they have the power to pass such a vote, except on a question of adjournment, shall be submitted to the President for his approval, and if vetoed by him shall be returned. Is this a concurrent vote in the language of the Constitution? If not, why not? Surely it was not the intention to give the President a veto on the election of his rival or successor; and yet if a concurrent vote of the two Houses may do it, that vote must be submitted to the President for approval. This shows the absurdity of the proposition upon which this bill rests. This power to reject a vote by a concurrent vote is drawn by inference from the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives. If you have it you must share it with the President. I do not believe you have that power, though from the necessity of the case the two Houses may say whether the vote opened in their presence is or is not the vote of a State entitled to representation.

Now, Mr. President, I come to the conclusion of my remarks, and I submit to the Senate whether it is not better to count the vote as it has been counted heretofore. The vote must be counted. The counting of a vote is ministerial, but it is to some extent probably judicial. It has been counted, as I said before, twenty-two times. Why should it not be counted again in the same way? All the grounds upon which this bill is now sought to be defended were answered once by a member who shared in framing the Constitution, great in his day as any man in this presence. In the first speech which he made on this subject of undertaking by law to regulate the count, he anticipated all the arguments which have been made in this body. I will read to you some brief extracts from the speech of Mr. Pinckney in 1800, when the first bill was under consideration:

> Mr Charles Pinckney, of South Carolina, thought it a very dangerous practice to endeavor to amend the Constitution by making laws for the purpose. * * * He remembered very well that in the Federal convention great care was used to provide for the election of the President of the United States independently of Congress; to take the business as far as possible out of their hands. The votes are to be given by electors appointed for that express purpose, the electors are to be appointed by each State, and the whole direction as to the manner of their appointment is given to the State Legislatures. Nothing was more clear to him than that Congress had no right to meddle with it at all; as the whole was intrusted to the State Legislatures, they must make provision for all questions arising on the occasion.

> Mr. Abraham Baldwin, of Georgia, is reported at greater length than any other speaker. The gist of his remarks was in his last sentence. His own opinion was that the provisions on this subject were already sufficient; that all the difficulties which had been suggested were as safely left to the decision of the assemblies of electors as of any body of men that could be devised; and that the members of the Senate and House of Representatives, when met together in one room, should receive the act of the electors as they would the act of any other constitutional branch of the Government, to judge only of its authentication, and then to proceed to count the votes, as directed in the second article of the Constitution.

I will also read another paragraph from Mr. Pinckney at a later stage of the debate:

Mr. Pinckney, on the necessity of guarding against violations of the Constitution, such as had been suggested by friends of the bill, said: "If the bill is not passed, we are to depend, as we have hitherto done, on the attachment of the States and the good sense and integrity of their executives."

That is precisely our situation now—

That the Constitution makes this dependence necessary, and as we have never yet been disappointed, we are to hope we never shall. But surely its friends never could have considered the extent and danger of giving to this committee, or even to Congress, the right to decide on double returns, or they must immediately have seen the extreme impropriety of attempting it. It is, in short, nothing less than holding out to the minority in all the States a temptation to dispute every election, and to always bring forward double returns. In every State where the election is strongly contested there will, of course, be a minority. It will be easily known by the measures of Congress to which candidate the majority of that body inclines and whose friends will compose the committee that are to be thus packed and selected. If the minority in a particular State find that the candidate they have unsuccessfully supported is the favorite one with the majority of Congress or their committees, they will easily discover the means of raising objections to the validity of the return of the electors, insist that they themselves are elected, proceed to the length of meeting and voting, and transmit to Congress a double return.

And so he goes on, answering one by one the very arguments which are now made upon which to base this bill. It must be remembered that three years after these arguments were uttered the law-makers of the country had before them this very provision of the Constitution to redraft and redraw. This was in 1801; and three years afterward, in 1803, when they drafted and made the twelfth amendment of the Constitution, they used the very same words, so far as this subject was concerned, as were in the original draught of the Constitution, showing that they were entirely satisfied with those words. I might quote from this book the opinions of several Senators now present in harmony with Mr. Pinckney, but I will not do that; because upon a question of this kind every man ought to weigh and give the best result of his mature judgment. I have no doubt that my own opinions expressed in this book may be different from those which I now entertain, and so with nearly every one who has spoken. The contrary opinion grew out of the twenty-third rule and the anomalous condition of several States after the war. But for that twenty-third rule this question would not have been before us. It is high time that the extreme powers claimed by Congress and by either House to reject electoral votes should be renounced rather than affirmed, as in this bill. We are not now presented, as we were in 1865, with seven or eight States whose condition was absolutely disputed, whether in or out of the Union. We are rid of the twenty-third joint rule. Why not, then, return to the ancient ways of our fathers? The only law necessary is to make the way easy, plain, and summary of transferring a legal dispute about a presidential election from the ministerial court over which you preside in our presence to the Supreme Court of the United States as the final arbiter of this and all other disputes. Then every head will bow and every patriot will assent to their decision. A summary proceeding could be provided to carry such a cause rapidly from the open count here in the Senate Chamber to the Supreme Court of the United States to decide these questions.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. STEVENSON. The Senator said this was to be a secret conclave with closed doors. Will he point out to me the part of the bill which makes that provision?

Mr. SHERMAN. With open or closed doors at their will.

Mr. STEVENSON. You said in secret session, and I have not found that in the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. The last section of the bill provides:

That said commission shall make its own rules, keep a record of its proceedings, and shall have power to employ such persons as may be necessary, &c.

Its whole manner of proceeding is left to them. They may make it secret and may travel all over the world for their jurisdiction. The trouble is that their powers are unlimited. I heartily approve of one feature of the bill, that neither House can reject the electoral vote of a State; that would be simply organized revolution; but I cannot agree to the broad proposition that the two Houses may by a concurrent vote reject the electoral vote of a State. Such a concurrent vote except on questions of adjournment is clearly void unless presented to the President of the United States, and it is not fairly implied by the language of the twelfth amendment. I believe the effect of the bill, however laudable and patriotic the motive of the committee which reported it, in creating a commission composed in equal parts of the Supreme Court, the Senate, and the House of Representatives, will be bad and an evil example, and will do more harm than good; and I believe it to be unconstitutional.

But it is said that the country is in peril. Will you do nothing to save the country? Yes. I will obey the law; I will cheerfully and heartily acquiesce in the result of the election; I will attend and witness the electoral count conducted in the same manner that it has been conducted from 1789 to 1865. I expect to see the vote of every State and the electors of every State duly counted and recorded and duly certified to by the officers conceded on all hands to be the legal and only officers in the State in which they certified on the first Wednesday of December last, when the votes were cast. I expect to see the vote of every elector who received a majority of legal votes cast counted and recorded for Governor Hayes or Governor Tilden. I will make no technical exception that would defeat the will of the people of any State expressed and defined according to their own law. What more can you ask? Must we yield to menaces and threats? Must we hurriedly patch up laws novel in their provisions, unconstitutional as I believe, connecting in an unseemly way the different departments of the Government, introducing into the sacred urn of our electoral system the blind goddess of chance, and all this to try a case already made up? No, no, gentlemen. I do not believe the American people will break up this Government of ours because the attempt in Louisiana to intimidate her own voters was defeated by her own laws. Nor do I believe they will grieve because the trick of Cronin and Grover in Oregon, well paid for, was defeated by being overdone. If Tilden is elected let him by all means enjoy the honors of the office. If Hayes is elected you should be willing to aid him in an administration of purity, of honor, and of conciliation. I would not be the cause of shedding the blood of a single human being to secure the election of either, and I would not yield one inch of the right of either to the threat of lawless violence.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, before reaching the details of this measure or its advantages or wisdom, we must make sure of the power, in some mode, to subject the verification and count of electoral votes to the action of the two Houses, or to the law-making power. A study of the question years ago, convinced me of the right and therefore the duty of the two Houses, to ascertain and verify electoral votes and declare the true result of presidential elections, or else by an exertion of the law-making power to declare how these acts shall be done. My present judgment does not rest however wholly on preconceived opinions. Some weeks ago, when the inquiry came to be invested with unprecedented importance, I reviewed carefully every act and proceeding in our history bearing upon it, and, without the aid then of compilations made since, every utterance in regard to it to be found in books.

A distinction may be drawn between the power of the Senate and the House themselves to execute this duty directly by force of the Constitution alone, and the power of Congress by law to direct it to be done in any way other than strictly and literally by the two Houses. It is not my purpose at this moment to explore this distinction, nor to inquire how far, or whether at all, the Constitution inculcates the exact mode or form in which the two Houses, or Congress, shall execute the twelfth article. If the function and duty there commanded be within the province of the two Houses, or if the Constitution leaves to the law-making power the right to declare the mode by which presidential elections shall be verified, the proposed bill is competent, as I may attempt hereafter to show. If the two Houses are themselves by the Constitution commanded to count the votes, the bill executes the Constitution. If, however, the true meaning of article 12 merely commands the votes to be counted, without declaring by whom they shall be counted, then Congress, the repository of "all legislative powers," is directed how to proceed by the concluding words of section 8, article 1. It is there ordained that—

The Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof.

But if the power in question is deposited by the Constitution, and is not deposited with the two Houses, neither the bill on the table nor any bill, rule, or plan seeking to draw the count of electoral votes, or their examination, within the jurisdiction of the two Houses or of Congress, is of the slightest efficacy or validity. If, by the Constitution, the Senate and House are only spectators of the count, there is an end of the matter as to them and as to each of them. Any action by either House, is then sheer intrusion—any statute proposing action, is null, and an attempt to violate the Constitution by usurping powers it withholds. If the power to ascertain and count is vested in the President of the Senate, perhaps the form of his proceeding—for example whether he shall take up the States alphabetically or otherwise in opening certificates, might be prescribed by law. But any act or rule to strip him of the power or of any part of the power reposed in him by the Constitution, would be plainly void. The Constitution declares that the President of the United States shall be Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy. A statute declaring the Secretary of State, or any body save only the President alone, Commander-in-Chief, or putting any one in partnership with him as Commander-in-Chief, would be null. Nor does it alter the case if the Constitution vests power by implication rather than by express words. It matters not what words are employed, whether they be palpably explicit, or so general or few that resort must be had to construction to ascertain their force and meaning. Whenever a power is by the Constitution, in any form of words whatever, deposited with an officer or department, there it is, and there it must remain as long as the Constitution remains unaltered.

It has never been seriously contended, at least never until of late, it never was seriously contended until we had "a case on hand," if I may borrow a phrase from a distinguished Senator, that this power belongs to one House alone, or to one House more than to the other. Most of those who challenge the competency of a bill dealing with the subject, maintain that the power resides in the President of the Senate. If then the bill before the Senate executes the Constitution whether the twelfth article requires the count to be by the two Houses literally, or only requires that Congress shall cause it to be made, it cannot trench on the Constitution unless the President of the Senate is endowed with the power to conduct and determine the count.

This question I propose to examine by the text of the Constitution, aided by the settled rules of construction, by the opinions of the most illustrious men of four generations, and by the practice and acquiescence of the nation and of all departments of the Government for eighty-seven years.

The President of the Senate is clearly the person to whom the electors are to transmit, in a sealed packet, the certificate of their own appointment, and of the ballots they cast—he is clearly the person who is to keep these packets, and keep them inviolate, till the day comes when the law says that Congress shall be in session, the certificates shall be opened, the votes counted, "and the persons who shall fill the offices of President and Vice-President ascertained and declared agreeably to the Constitution."

How the President of the Senate, rather than some other person or officer, came to be selected as the custodian of these sealed packets, we are not left to conjecture. The history of the formation of the Constitution informs us. The selection was made in a draught or plan afterward disapproved in its chief feature. By that plan it was proposed to give to the Senate alone the choice of the President in case of a failure by the electors to choose him. An incident, and a natural incident of this arrangement, was to commit the custody of the certificates to the presiding officer of the body which was to elect the President if none was found to have been chosen. This proposal was rejected, and the power to choose the President in case none had been chosen by the electors of the States, was conferred on the House of Representatives. Other changes were made, but the original draught served throughout as the basis of action. Alterations were made in it, but without discarding it totally and beginning anew, just as alterations are usually made in a bill by amendments, one at a time, instead of rejecting the whole bill in gross, and substituting a new one for it.

One of the details not thus altered, was the designation of him who should receive and keep, and be responsible for till they were needed, and then produce, the electoral certificates.

With or without this ray of light falling on the few words whose meaning we must learn, one thing will probably be admitted by all. It will not be denied that had any other officer been denoted as the President of the Senate is, his duty, power, and prerogative, would be exactly the same. Had the President of the United States, or the Secretary of State, or the Speaker of the House, or the Secretary of the Senate, or the Clerk of the House, been the officer named, in either case the same words would confer on him the same power and impose the same duty now reposed in the President of the Senate—neither more or less.

This brings me to the language of Article Twelve of the Constitution.

It is there declared that the electors shall meet in their respective States, and, within certain restrictions, vote for President and Vice-President, and that they shall make and certify a statement of their proceedings and transmit it sealed to the seat of Government directed to the President of the Senate. The contents were to be a secret. The purpose was to commit to the unpledged discretion of the electors, they being relied on as a body of sagacious unbiased men, the absolute selection of a Chief Magistrate choosing from the whole body of the people. In aid of this purpose they were required to vote by ballot so that even bystanders might not know how an elector voted, or for whom votes were given. To secure and continue secrecy, the votes were to be enveloped under seal, that curiosity might not pry into them, or fraud, alter or destroy them, till they were disclosed to the whole nation. A responsible and trustworthy custodian was essential to their inviolate preservation. The modern practice of parties has overturned the idea of unpledged electors, and now electors represent particular candidates nominated in advance; the Constitution however remains, and knowing its purpose, the confidence reposed in this regard in the President of the Senate would not be belittling to the highest functionary on earth. An act of 1792, re-enacted in 1874 as part of the Revised Statutes, amplifies and defines the duties of the electors, and among other things requires them to annex to the certificates of their proceedings the evidence of their own appointments.

Pursuing the Constitution, we find these words following those already referred to:

> The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted.

A familiar maxim of construction is, that meaning and effect must be given, as far as may be, to every word. This is true of the most trifling agreement between men. It must be at least as true of a frame of government laboriously devised and meant to stand as an eternal wedlock between peoples and states. The first words we meet here are "in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives." The consequence attached to these words may be somewhat inferred from occurrences in the First and Second Congresses, in which sat eighteen of the thirty-nine men who framed the Constitution. By an act of Congress they required that on the day when the persons shall be ascertained and declared who shall fill the offices of President and Vice-President "the Congress shall be in session." Perhaps the first question which arises is for what was the Congress thus twice required to be in session? Obviously for some act, or, that its members may be spectators—they could hardly be witnesses of such an act in any reasonable sense if the act is to be done exclusively by one person. If the President of the Senate alone, is empowered to determine what shall be counted, and to count, and adjudge the result, it is not easy to see how the two Houses can in any just and effectual sense witness and verify the truth of that he does. They can hear what the officer says if he chooses to say anything, but nothing requires him to speak a word. No declaration even at the end, is required by the Constitution. The whole proceeding may be in silence. But if the custodian of the certificates, after they are opened, chooses to state their contents or effect, and this be all, the whole transaction is his. He takes up a paper in his seat and peruses it as he would peruse a letter. The Senators and Representatives see him from the body of the Hall, but they no more see or know the signatures or seals or words or figures appearing on the paper, than if they gazed at the spectacle from the galleries, or saw it as a concourse sees the oath of office administered to the President on the eastern portico of the Capitol. If the President of the Senate announces that no one has a majority, the House must either accept the statement, though it may be believed erroneous, and proceed to an election, or the House must disregard the statement and refuse to proceed. The Constitution plainly states the hinge whereon the action of the House must turn. Saying nothing about what any one shall say or declare, article 12, dealing with the fundamental fact, ordains that if no one has in truth received a majority of all the votes, and of all the electors appointed, the House of Representatives shall immediately choose the President. The fact proved by the votes, is made the sole criterion, and whether it was intended that the House should act on what the President of the Senate might say about the fact, or on what the House itself might know or believe about the fact, is an inquiry I commend to those who suppose that only one person, and he not connected with the House, is authorized to examine the votes and determine their validity and effect. If the members of either House suspected forgery or error, as matter of right they could take no proceeding relating to the count, and if the act of the President of the Senate is effectual and binding, it would afterward be too late. It must, however, be admitted notwithstanding all this, that these words in and of themselves may be satisfied by supposing that the two Houses, consisting now of about four hundred members, are required to be present with their officers merely to behold a pageant, to see and be seen, as spectators of an occasion wherein they can act no part.

The text proceeds. The President of the Senate shall "open all the certificates." There is no room for construction here. This is a plain grant of power to do a certain simple thing, and a direction to do it. Now the language changes. "The President of the Senate" is dropped; he disappears, and nowhere re-appears: "And the votes shall then be counted." That is, a count of the votes shall then take place; a count of the votes shall then be had. "The votes shall then be counted." By whom? By him? As two Senators have inquired, why was it not said "by him?" How easy to add these two little words, "by him!" The men who drafted this solemn instrument, masters of language as most of them were, were so fastidious in taste, so scrupulous in the execution of their work, so determined that words should become exact vehicles of thought, that they appointed a committee on style in order that every syllable might do its needed office. How, Mr. President, would men only ordinarily instructed in the English language have expressed themselves had they intended that the President of the Senate should count the votes? "The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certi icates and count the votes," are the words which ninety and nine men in a hundred would naturally have written or spoken. Had they said "the President of the Senate shall count the votes" simply, that would have been plain. Why? Because no man can count or examine the contents of a sealed packet without opening it, and there implication would have made all plain. So had they said "open and count the votes." But no, he "shall open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted." Why "then?" If the President of the Senate was to open and count, if it was to be one act at one time in one place by one person, all parts of the act must of necessity be "then," must they not? Why bring in the word "then?" But why change the current of the sentence, and why use twice as many words as were necessary or natural, when the effect of doing so would be to bewilder, if not mislead, the reader? The Constitution is terse, sententious, a model of comprehensive brevity. You scan it in vain for another instance of a phrase so loose and needlessly wordy, if indeed the intent was to say that the person who was to open the certificates should also count.

In the first instance these words "in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives" were proposed not before the word "counted" but after the word "counted;" so that it would have stood and it did stand "the votes shall then be counted in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives." In the earlier considerations of the convention the words so standing were accepted more than once. At length the provision was referred to the committee on style, and I beg to inquire for what purpose? To change the meaning of those who by little accretions of concurrence had built up step by step with patience and care a great fabric of government, destined as they believed to stand so strong and last so long? Was the purpose of the committee on style and of those who trusted the committee, to take liberties with substance, and to change the essence as it had been agreed to? O, no, but to define the meaning more sharply, to project it more distinctly and unmistakbly before the minds of those who in a far future would appeal to this instrument as the testament and revelation of free institutions. When the committee reported these words to the consideration of the convention for final and perfected action, they stood as they stand now "in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted." Was it ever, in all the scrutiny which those words underwent, proposed to use such words as would commit the power compressed into the word "count," to the President of the Senate? Were any of the forms I have suggested or other forms clearly denoting that, ever proposed at all? No, sir; but on the contrary, after all this care, and painstaking, the words as we see them were adopted, as the last, most deliberate, consummate act of the constitutional convention.

If we thoughtfully read these words, and the change they introduce into the sentence, several intents appear in dropping the President of the Senate and employing the present phrase "the votes shall then be counted." What "votes?" Not all votes. "All the certificates" are to be opened, but not all votes are to be counted. "The votes" are to "be counted." What votes? The constitutional, valid, true votes; not six votes from Oregon although six appear; not necessarily the three votes certified by the governor of Oregon although he is the certifying officer by the act of 1792 and the only certifying officer known to the national laws; but the three honest votes, if there are three. These three, and only these, are to be counted. Counting and ascertaining becomes substantial, and we see reasons for so making it, if we recur only to the exclusions provided by the Constitution. The honorable Senator from Indiana said yesterday that the President of the Senate—I borrow his phrase—is to count everything "good, bad, and indifferent." Mr. President I dissent from this position. The act of 1792 already referred to declares, speaking of the proceedings in question:

> That Congress shall be in session * * * and the said certificates, or so many of them as shall have been received, shall then be opened, the votes counted, and the persons who shall fill the offices of President and Vice-President ascertained and declared, agreeably to the Constitution.

The Constitution names five instances in which no majority of votes shall work the ascertainment to fill the office of President of the United States. Was it designed that votes cast for one dead should be counted, and that he should fill with an aching void the office of President of the United States? Would that be "agreeable" to the Constitution? Was it designed that votes forged should be counted; votes, not certified or certified by an usurper, counted blindly and without inquiry? Was it designed, if lying on our table be a record denouncing against a convict on impeachment perpetual exclusion from every office of profit, emolument, or trust, that votes cast for him should be counted and made effectual, and this, because although not good, such votes might be "bad or indifferent?" No, Mr. President. Should the State of Massachusetts send here an electoral certificate on which should appear as the first two electors the names of my honored friends the Senators from Massachusetts, and if then should follow as electors the name of every Representative from Massachusetts, designating them respectively as Senators and Representatives, I should read in the Constitution that "no Senator or Representative" shall be or shall even be "appointed an elector," and I should say those votes, although they might be "bad" or "indifferent," were not to be held good until they were at least considered. "Agreeably to the Constitution" some heed must be given to its plain and absolute prohibitions, and "bad" votes, that is to say forbidden votes, are not of course or by main force to be counted as if they were "good" votes, which is to say legal and constitutional votes.

But, it has been said that the power of the President of the Senate, though not expressed in the Constitution, may be implied from that which is expressed. It has been whispered that the President of the Senate may, in a closet or a corner, a month in advance, adjudge, determine, and conclude the electoral count by refusing to receive any certificate except that which he chooses in the end to count. That is, he may decide that he will receive two certificates from Oregon, that being a large if not a populous State, but that one each must suffice for all the other States, and so he would take but one. The existing President of the Senate, discharging as he habitually does, with conscience and propriety, the duties resting on him, has already, I am informed, received contesting certificates from the three or four States from which they come. I have heard no one say aloud that having received them, it will be his duty or prerogative to suppress or conceal any of them; and therefore I proceed to consider whether by implication he has the power to judge between them, to determine what shall become of them, and what is their legal import and quality.

The doctrine of implication stretched to cover the ground here involved, may be said to derive implication from implication, or rather to rait implication on implication. The argument seems to be first, that because the President of the Senate is the custodian of the certificates and directed to open them, it may be implied that he has power afterward to count the votes they contain; and then from that implied power it may be implied that he has the power to determine what shall be counted; and then from this second implied power may be implied the power to decide and affirm the effect of the count he has made, and of the votes he has held valid.

The argument in favor of the authority of the President of the Senate certainly deserves respectful consideration. It has found no voice in this debate. It is a position against which, if I mistake not, every member of this body on both sides, save four, stands on his oath recorded. I repeat it has found no voice in this debate; but I receive it respectfully as a suggestion which I must weigh carefully, because beyond these walls the thought has been advanced by those whose words and opinions are entitled to be weighed.

The doctrine of implication or implied powers as long and unchangably known to the law, may thus be stated: When power is given to do a thing, permission is implied to employ the means to do it. Whatever is essential to the full and complete execution or enjoyment of a thing granted, is deemed to be granted also. Experience abounds in illustration of this species of intendment. A spot of ground is granted in the midst of a great field. It is implied that the grantee has granted to him also a right to pass over the intervening ground to get to his possession. When the Constitution empowers Congress to coin money, to borrow money, to establish post-offices and post-roads, power is implied to resort to the needed ways and means, and thus, to authorize banks, and mints, the acquirement of real estate, and the like. This is the doctrine of the old Supreme Court with Marshall at its head, in McCulloch vs. Maryland, in Weston vs. The City of Charleston; and in many noted cases since. When the Constitution authorizes the President on the call of a governor or Legislature to employ troops upon the happening of a certain contingency, the power is implied in him to inquire and determine whether that contingency has arisen. So said the Supreme Court in the case of Mott vs. Martin.

But the terminus and boundaries of this doctrine, are as certain as legal bounds can be. Whatever is essential or conveniently conducive to, or fairly in aid of a granted power, may be implied or inferred; but nothing more. Here is the end, in reason, and in law

Implication operates in favor of the right to do an act minor to and involved in something beyond which is expressly authorized. Power to do a limited and defined thing, does not ordinarily work power to do a greater thing—the greater contains the less, not the less the greater. Power to do an act of one species or nature, does not work by implication power to do a separate act of a different species or nature, particularly an act of more exalted nature, not essential to the act expressly authorized. Power to do a ministerial act does not imply power to act judicially. Authority to act as custodian of papers, does not confer license to exercise transcendent powers of sovereignty, or of supreme ultimate political and public determination. Express authority to do a given thing never implies power to do anything whatever after the act authorized is completely done and ended. The certificates must be opened before their contents can be examined or passed upon—they must be opened before counting their contents can begin: how then can power to judge and ascertain afterward, be inferred from power to produce and open beforehand? How can the latter be incident to the former? Breaking the seals is merely prefatory to a wholly different proceeding.

A clerk of a court, or the presiding justice, is made the recipient and custodian of papers—he is to keep them untouched and sealed till a certain day, and then he is to carry them into court and open them. Would a statute declaring that the papers should then be acted on, or should then undergo examination, or that facts of which they were evidential should then be found, mean that the clerk, or the one justice, and not the court, was to act on the papers, or pass upon them, or find the facts from them, and would his power to do any or all of these things be implied from the fact of his being the custodian of the packet?

If, in the instance supposed, the sheriff were the custodian, and the contents of the packet were warrants and summons, and the statute declared that these writs should then be served, how should we know who was to serve them? The appropriateness of the sheriff for such a purpose would suggest him as the proper person, but this is not all. We should know it was the sheriff who should act, because the law declares that the sheriff shall serve all such writs.

But in the case supposed if the statute said "and the validity and effect of the writs shall then be passed upon," should we infer that the sheriff was to pass upon them, and this because the law made him their custodian? We should know the court was to do this, merely because the function is judicial and the court is a judicial body and so authorized by law.

Apply the rule to the matter before us. We know too well the nature of the possible inquiries involved. Committees have gone far and wide to conduct them. My distinguished friend from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] has pained us by his absence for weeks, because deputed by the Senate to tarry in a distant State. Many other Senators have done the like. The framers of the Constitution knew and pondered the sort of problems which might arise for solution: they have left us evidence that they were not unmindful of some of the questions which now confront us.

My inquiry at this point is whether the President of the Senate is so equipped for settling disputed questions of fact, is so endowed with facilities for resolving problems like these, that reason and intendment point to him alone as the tribunal to decide?

The person having the largest number of votes, of valid, legal votes, be it a majority, is to be the President. The question is, who "shall fill the office of President?" The Constitution has named, as I said, at least five cases in which, although a majority of votes be given for a candidate, he shall not fill the office of President. No person shall fill the office of President unless he be a native-born citizen; no person shall fill the office of President unless he has attained the age of five and thirty years; no person shall fill the office of President unless he has been fourteen years a resident of the country; no person shall fill the office of President chosen by the votes of electors in the State wherein he resides who voted also for another person in the same State for Vice-President; no person shall fill the office of President who, having been impeached by the grand inquest of the nation, has been branded by the votes of two-thirds of this body and immutably disqualified. The certificates may be forgeries, the pretended electors may not be the true electors, he who assumes as governor to certify the electors may not be the governor at all.

These and other questions may arise; still higher and larger questions may arise. Has the President of the Senate power to send for persons and papers; to compel the surrender of telegrams, and imprison witnesses if they will not give them up? Who has that power? Who had it when the Constitution was made? Was there any body who familiarly in both hemispheres had wielded such power? Yes, sir, the British Parliament for ages had possessed and exercised the power to judge of the election, qualifications, and returns of officials. The State Legislatures on this continent had done the same thing. Joint meetings of two legislative houses had long been common. It had been customary for the Lords and Commons to assemble in joint conference, and their rules relative to such meetings, more than two centuries old, stand I believe even to this day. So, after our Constitution was adopted it was customary for the Senate and House to meet and sit together to receive the message or speech of the President of the United States. The two houses of State Legislatures, from the beginning, have assembled together; they do so still, not only to elect regents of universities, not only to choose Senators in Congress, but to see opened, to canvass, to ascertain, to determine the count of votes and the results of elections. The honorable Senator from Ohio sits before me [Mr. THURMAN] and seeing him reminds me of an ancient custom in his State. As early perhaps as 1802 the State of Ohio had I think in its fundamental law substantially the words of our Constitution "the presiding officer shall open the certificates in the presence of the two houses and the votes shall then be counted." Was this the provision?

Mr. THURMAN. Pretty nearly.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask the Senator from Ohio to correct me if I am wrong in saying that even at that early day and always during the maintenance of that constitution, it was the settled and uncontested understanding that the presiding officer merely opened the certificates, and that the two houses of the Legislature of Ohio together proceeded to count or canvass the votes. Am I right in that?

Mr. THURMAN. That is right as to the governor.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The chief magistrate.

Mr. CONKLING. The chief magistrate of the State. I ask then whether it can be doubted that the men who employed the words "and the votes shall then be counted" knew of a tribunal or body having powers and faculties adequate to the conduct of such a proceeding?

It has been said that the count is a mere addition of units; that nothing is needed to count except common honesty and common sense. I do not understand the word to be so employed in the Constitution. Counting may be of different kinds. To count my fingers is a purely ministerial act and very simple. To count a pile of papers is a ministerial act. To count bank-notes in which there may be counterfeits; and separate the true from the false, is more than a ministerial act, it requires judgment; it involves faculty. To "open all the certificates" is a ministerial act; as my honorable friend from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] suggests, as a porter might open a bale of goods. It is purely a ministerial act. But to count the votes, is something more. Why? "All the certificates" are to be opened; but not all votes are to be counted. The valid, constitutional votes, and no other votes, are to counted; and he who counts them, with his fan in his hand, must winnow the wheat from the chaff, if there be chaff. If New York sends 45 votes as electoral votes, they are not all to be counted, because New York is entitled to only 35 electoral votes. They are to be sorted, the bad and indifferent are to be separated from the good, and only the 35 true constitutional votes are to be counted; because they who were intruders or ignorantly added their names to the roll, did an act unauthorized, and therefore void. If the certificate of Massachusetts should by accident or fraud show that her votes were cast for the democratic candidates, the world knows that Massachusetts voted for the republican nominees, and, therefore, the certificate is not to be blindly counted, or counted at all without inquiry and verification. If electoral votes are cast for Julius Cæsar—or for Harry the Eighth, or a British subject—they are not to be counted without inquiry.

An illustration of the difference between these two kinds of counting, may be found in an incident of the last examination of electoral votes. In 1873, four electors of the State of Georgia voted for Horace Greeley. What was the objection to that? Why should they not vote for one of the most eminent members of one of the largest professions? What was the difficulty? Was there any doubt that the electors were appointed? No, sir. Was there objection to their election? No, sir. Was not Georgia a State in the Union? Had not every propriety and mandate been observed? Yes, sir. But a Representative from the State of Massachusetts rose in the meeting of the two Houses and said:

I object to the count of those votes; I object because it is announced that Mr. Greeley was buried on the day on which those votes were cast.

Let me be more explicit with the Senate in stating the process of the member who made the objection. Legally dissected, his statement was this: "The certificate is blameless on its face; there is a State behind it; these four men were legal electors; but the newspapers have announced that Mr. Greeley was buried on the day the votes were cast: nobody has said he was buried alive, therefore it may be concluded, and the Houses may act upon it as a fact, that Mr. Greeley was not alive when the ballots were given." The two Houses separated. In this House, the honorable Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] proposed a resolution declaring that these four votes should not be counted. The Senator from Ohio before me [Mr. THURMAN] moved to amend by striking out the word "not," which amendment prevailed. I then moved an amendment, to add to the resolution, which then declared that those four undoubted votes for Mr. Greeley should be counted, words declaring the function of the two Houses in counting the votes to be ministerial as distinguished from the effect of that count or of those votes. Recently it has been stated that by this proposed amendment I had expressed the opinion that counting any votes, in any sense within the power of the two Houses, is purely ministerial! O, no, sir, I offered the amendment to have it appear that when the Senate said votes for a dead man should be counted, the Senate meant merely that being the votes of legal electors they should be enumerated, and announced, not that they should in legal effect be counted so that had there been a majority of votes for one dead it would follow that the Houses would ascertain and declare that a dead man should "fill the office of President of the United States." While these proceedings were progressing in this Chamber, the House considered the four Georgia votes also. The House said the vote should not be counted at all in any sense, and so they were ignored and rejected. I refer to this to distinguish between counting the chairs in the Senate Chamber, and doing that which is involved in the constitutional direction touching the electoral votes.

The word "count" does not govern so much as the words "the votes," the question always being what are "the votes" in the sense of the Constitution and of truth. The power which makes this determination is not technically judicial. Why? Because the question does not arise in a judicial proceeding. It is quasi judicial. It is the power to judge; it is the power to decide mixed questions of law and fact; it is the power, by judgment, to affirm truth and fact. The power to judge whether a bill shall pass or not, is not technically judicial; neither is it ministerial.

The power to pass on the validity and effect of electoral votes, is political: Yes, it is political; its exercise may involve the very highest attributes of sovereignty. When Colorado is reached, suppose a Member or Senator rises and says "I object to the votes of Colorado, because she is not a State in the Union." In the case of Colorado there is no doubt; but the question is the same as if she were shrouded in doubt. The question is, shall her vote be counted. The objection is that she is not a State in the Union, and the count or refusal to count her vote, is the only response to the objection. No higher political question can be solved or asked. Is she a State in law and in fact? Mr. President, nations have fought over that question for centuries. A State to-morrow may stand under the uplifted banners of revolt; she may pass an ordinance of secession, prostrate all the forms of government, make treaties with foreign nations, seize the forts, arsenals, post-offices, custom-houses, dock-yards, and ships of the nation, and march an army into sister States. Shall her vote be counted? It is no answer to say, the law-making power may fix her status in advance. If her certificate is here, the question is, shall her votes be counted; and he who has the power to decide that question may decide it as he lists. The law-making power may have acted, or may have had no time to act, and what may be the force and effect of its action if it has acted, is only a factor in the open question.

Mr. EDMUNDS. An indeterminate one at that, on this theory.

Mr. CONKLING. Yes, an indeterminate one of course. A minority, but a considerable minority of the Law Committee of the House of Representatives is said to have reported that Colorado is not a State, that she is inchoate, inconsummate as a member of the Union, her statehood being in the chrysalis. Suppose, armed with this report, a member of the House objects to the count of Colorado's vote. The law-making power has acted, but the very question would be what is the force and effect of that action; and the Senator from Vermont may well say the action is indeterminate. If the Constitution reposes in you, sir, the prerogative and duty of determining what votes shall be counted, who are the members of the sisterhood of States by whom the Chief Magistrate is to be elected, whether you might weakly lean upon the opinion of somebody else or not, I will not consider; but you and you alone at first and at last are to solve the question. Indeed, if I were to accept what was said by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] this morning, I should begin to doubt myself whether my friends from Colorado are members of the Senate. I understood the Senator from Ohio to argue that the two Houses by law cannot enact in advance that on the happening of a certain contingency, a certain legal verity and conclusion shall become established. He stated that expressly, if I understood him aright. If that be true, awkward indeed would be the dilemma of Colorado. Congress, by an enabling act, authorized the then Territory of Colorado to assume statehood, the act declaring in advance that upon the happening of certain contingencies and proclamation thereof by the President of the United States, she should become crowned with statehood, with like force and effect as if she stood full-grown and proclaimed before the adoption of the act. The President has made that proclamation, evidential of that contingency; and the act of Congress, speaking afresh when the condition is complied with, Colorado is as complete in her rights as a member of the Union, as is the proudest or the most ancient State in all the sisterhood. But the Senator from Ohio disputes the doctrine by which she is here, and in so doing he confronts and combats the Supreme Court. That court long ago held in the embargo cases that such legislation in advance, incomplete, inconclusive, and inoperative, until the happening of an external contingency, is competent, and becomes effectual when the contingency occurs.

Mr. EDMUNDS. According to the judgment of the President of the United States.

Mr. CONKLING. And as my friend reminds me, the contingency resting on the action and judgment of the President of the United States.

But, Mr. President, I wander from the purpose. I had alluded to the proportions of questions lying within the power to decide whether electoral votes or alleged electoral votes shall or shall not be counted and made efficacious. I now maintain that the scope and vastness of this power, and of the questions and possibilities it may involve, are the measure of the certainty and clearness with which it must be conferred. Loose intendments will not do. Loose intendments may suffice for paltry uses; but in the last quarter of the nineteenth century loose intendments will not satisfy forty-five million free people that such supremacy resides in one functionary who may be made today by one majority of the votes in this single Chamber, and unmade to-morrow by the change of a single vote.

Do reason, and the fitness of things suggest that our fathers meant the President of the Senate should be the one man, even if there were to be one man, to decide whether alleged irregularity or fraud should vitiate the vote of a State, and turn the scale in the choice of Chief Magistrate of the Republic? Is such power so suited to one man, rather than to the American people in Congress assembled, that wisdom will extract it from words which drop him and turn away from him? The Constitution, speaking to you, Mr. President, commands you in the presence of the States and of the people to produce and open all the certificates, and at that moment it turns its back on you. Will reason from such words, even if they be doubtful words, extract such transcendent prerogative, and repose it with him who is likely to sit as the sole judge in his own case?

Six times already, has the President of the Senate been one of the presidential candidates for or against whom the count was to be made. Was this not foreseen by the framers of the Constitution? The very men who drafted it proceeded in seven years to make the President of the Senate their own successful presidential candidate. And so, we are asked to believe that our fathers intended to make one individual the sole judge in his own case, though divine law and civilized jurisprudence had declared since the morning of time that no man should ever be judge in his own case, not even if other judges sat with him. In 1800 the authors of the Constitution, creating a committee of fifteen to do what the commission now proposed is to do, provided jealously that no candidate, and no man of kin to a candidate should be of the committee. The other day we had under consideration a constitutional amendment committing to nine judges holding their commissions for life, and as independent of parties and factions as is the monarch of the skies, the count of presidential votes, and it was there bluntly provided that not one of them should ever be eligible as a presidential candidate until after the lapse of years. This is the modern standard of safeguard against self-interest. Yet we are asked to believe that our fathers, trained men, the victims of abuses under other systems, and profoundly jealous as their words and acts show they were of the weakness the ambition and the greed of man, deposited absolute power with a single individual to decide for himself and for the nation whether he should mount the highest pinnacle of American if not of human ambition. They imposed no disability, or even interval of probation, on this one judge, but straightway they made him the party also with their own hands! Such a judge we are invited to believe, they so intrenched, that in the presence of the whole nation, because in law every State and every citizen is present, he might by fraud or error undo the nation's will and the nation's right, and the nation must bow mute and helpless before wrong and usurpation. The courts of New Jersey, in accord with courts the world over, have lately said that no act of legislation can make a man judge in his own case, whether he sits alone or with other judges.

But we are warned that if the Houses have this power, they may baffle a count. They may throw out one State and another State until no majority of all the electors appointed remains. No doubt this is possible. Every page of the Constitution presents instances in which the two Houses, or one House alone, may defeat the Government. One House may refuse to pass appropriation bills, or tax bills, or army bills in war. The States may refuse to appoint electors or may appoint ineligible electors. The electors may refuse to vote or may vote for ineligible candidates. The President of the Senate may refuse to receive certificates, or refuse to open them, or refuse even to produce them. The governor of the State may refuse to certify or he may certify falsely. The Houses may refuse to attend, and so on. It all proves nothing. The answer Jefferson gave, "the Government rests on the consent of the governed." So must every free government rest while it stands at all, and whenever representatives and States and people forsake the government and leave it to languish and die, it will go down, as other governments have gone, to the sepulcher of blasted nationalities and buried epochs.

Is a majority less to be trusted than one man? A bare majority of one House may select a President of the Senate for the express, but secret purpose, of deciding a count and deciding it in a particular way. Is such a creature of an hour, doing the bidding of a bare majority of one House, more trustworthy than a majority of both Houses acting in the open light of day? Is the decision of one Senator in the case of Oregon, which decision might make him for one year or four years President of the United States, a stronger anchor for the nation than the decision of both Houses of Congress including that Senator, aided by the proposed tribunal in which five judges of the highest court must sit?

Mr. EDMUNDS. In a Republic.

Mr. CONKLING. Yes, and in this Republic, the only considerable experiment of free government extant on the globe—an experiment which, should it fail, would turn the clock of ages far back on the dial.

If the Constitution ordains this one-man power, let every man bow to it, mystery though it be. But I do not so read, I cannot so read. The canons of construction, the letter and spirit of the Constitution, reason, all revolt against a conclusion so puerile and so perilous. Prudence points with warning hand to a day when parties in the Senate may be reversed, and when new majorities may set up presiding officers to wield licentious power under a baneful precedent established now.

Thus far I have been indicating my own reasoning on the words employed. Let me now ascend to better reasoning. Let us inquire what has been done by illustrious men, sworn as we are sworn, to execute the Constitution. Let us survey the action of all the generations, and parties, and officials, who have proceeded under article 12, and also the action going before the Constitution and setting it in motion.

Reference has often been made to a resolution adopted by the constitutional convention in 1787. It has been cited as if it defined or construed the power we now consider. On the 17th of September, 1787, the constitutional convention adopted two resolutions. They were transmitted to the Congress of the Confederation. The Congress a few days afterward, on the 28th of September, accepted the report without acting upon it otherwise. These accompanying documents, and others, were sent to the States with the Constitution, and the Constitution was propounded to be ratified or rejected. One resolution recommended that the Senate should appoint a President for the sole purpose of opening and counting the electoral votes. Some observations may be made on this resolution in addition to those which fell from the Senator from Vermont.

In the first place the whole proceeding antedated the Constitution; it was before it was ratified; it was before it was proposed. Geologists would say it was prehistoric. It was a prefatory, or provisional proceeding. In the language of the resolution, "proceedings were to be commenced under the said Constitution." The ship was to be launched, and the launch might be by the sails or the machinery of the vessel, or by external and imparted force. It might be, as the French would say, by an impulsion; and those who made the launch chose so to make it. The resolution did not profess to define or construe any clause in the Constitution. It merely designated an occasion, and referred to the objects of that occasion. It did not even profess to conform to the modes which the Constitution would bring in. The Constitution directed that the electors should send their certificates to the President of the Senate. This resolution suggested that they should be sent to the Secretary of the United States. Who was he? He was the Clerk of the old Continental Congress. They had but one House and had a clerk, and this was the man. The resolution did not even propose that the counting should take place in the presence of the two Houses.

How did the Senate regard the action thus suggested.

George Washington had been unanimously chosen President. Every elector had voted for him. The electors themselves had been appointed with unanimity. Everybody from the beginning knew it would be so; it was matter of course. John Adams had been overwhelmingly elected Vice-President. To ascertain, the election, was a substantial and solemn proceeding, only as it is substantial and solemn for the Secretary of State to announce the Fourth of July, or a holiday.

The time "to commence proceedings," according to the suggestion of the resolution, was March 4, 1789. Ten States had ratified the Constitution. A quorum of the Senate was 11. No quorum came to the seat of Government till April 6. Then no Senator was sworn in; it was January 3, 1790, before the oath of office was taken. Till then, there was no Senate and no Senator, but only Senators-elect. Ten months before they were sworn in as Senators, and on the 6th of April, 1789, eleven of those who afterward became Senators, proceeded to start the Government, and impart life and motion to the Constitution.

They passed an order. Here it is:

Ordered, That Mr. Ellsworth inform the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate is to-morrow met, that a President is elected for the sole purpose of opening the certificates and counting the votes of the electors of the several States in the choice of a President and Vice-President of the United States; and that the Senate is now ready, in the Senate Chamber, to proceed in the presence of the House to discharge that duty; and that the Senate have appointed one of their members to sit at the Clerk's table to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared; submitting it to the wisdom of the House to appoint one or more of their members for the like purpose—who reported that he had delivered the message.

Had this order stopped midway, it might more plausibly be said to be a prescription or definition or expression of functions and powers. Even then I should deny that it was so; even then I should hold it merely to designate an occasion and purpose, not to determine or explain the part to be acted by each actor in the details of the transaction to take place. Let me illustrate my meaning: Suppose at the last session before the trial of an impeachment began, the Senate had adopted a resolution in these words "Ordered that Mr. Morrill be appointed President of the Senate for the sole purpose of trying the pending impeachment. Would such an order have implied that the President of the Senate so appointed was alone to conduct and determine the trial? Certainly not. Why not? Because the Constitution does not so ordain. The Constitution states how much, and what he shall do, and therefore he could do no more, and it would be violent to suppose that the body adopting the order meant him to do anything save only that committed exclusively to him by law.

The governor of a State by order or proclamation appoints a particular judge to hold court for the sole purpose of trying an indictment for murder against A B. We do not understand such a proclamation to mean that the judge so appointed is himself alone to conduct the trial and decide the case. So, had the order of the Senate in question stopped with saying that John Langdon was elected solely for one purpose, I should understand it to mean that he was elected to act the part legally incumbent on him in the execution of that purpose, whatever it might be. I should understand the meaning and effect to be that he was not elected President of the Senate permanently, or generally, but that he was elected for one occasion only, or as lawyers would say pro hac vice.

But unfortunately, fatally I think, for the argument I am combating, the resolution does not stop with declaring that John Langdon was chosen only for a single purpose or occasion; it proceeds, "and that the Senate is now ready in the Senate Chamber to proceed in the presence of the House to discharge that duty." The Senate is ready to discharge that duty. What duty? Manifestly to count the votes, along with the House.

Mr. SARGENT. Why not "then open the certificates?"

Mr. CONKLING. I thought I had assigned the reason. Because the Constitution declared who should open the certificates, and it declared that the President of the Senate should do it. In the distribution of duties, it reposed the duty to receive and open the certificates, in the President of the Senate. It expressly gave this duty to him as his share and function in the transaction, and having done so, it abstained from giving him any other share or function. The Senate therefore in speaking of the duty reposed in itself and the House, did not speak of another duty expressly reposed in somebody else.

There is I think only one escape from this construction of the resolution and proceeding. We may escape it by saying that the proceeding being to inaugurate the Constitution, those who conducted it did not deem the Constitution yet operative, and therefore did not govern themselves by its mandates. If this be so, of course the argument sought from the occasion, favoring the power of the President of the Senate, falls to the ground.

The resolution proceeds further:

And that the Senate have appointed one of their members to sit at the Clerk's table, to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared—

And "declared" here I take it means "read" or "reported" or "announced."

submitting it to the wisdom of the House to appoint one or more of their members for the like purpose—

What did the House do? The House appointed a teller, and resolved that it would attend—for the purpose expressed in the message delivered by Mr. Ellsworth.

I ask again what was that purpose? The House did attend. The tellers appointed by the two Houses made the enumeration of the votes. The Houses then separated. What next occurred? Mr. Madison came to the Senate to say that the House had directed him to inform the Senate that the House had agreed that the election should be certified or notified—now mark—"by such persons and in such manner as the Senate shall be pleased to direct." If the Constitution ordained that the President of the Senate should certify and declare the result, what had the House to do with it? What had the House to depute or concede to the Senate? What power could the Senate receive from the House? What could the Senate say or do in the matter, if the power and duty was lodged in the presiding officer? The Senate apparently thought however that it had everything to do with the affair after the House intrusted its part in it to the Senate.

A committee was appointed to prepare the certificates of election. One of the committee was Mr. Ellsworth and he had sat in the constitutional convention. The committee drew the certificate, and every word of it, and the President of the Senate was directed to sign it, and he did sign it. He signed it not of his own motion, or because authorized by the Constitution, but by the command of the Senate speaking for both Houses, and he signed it as the organ and mouthpiece of the two Houses.

The certificate recites that he who signed it had counted the votes. No doubt he counted them in the sense of arithmetic. Probably each of the other ten Senators did the like, the tellers surely did, but whatever they or the presiding officer did, was done by the assent and authority—nay by the command of the Houses. Had either teller been selected to sign the certificate, could he not have signed it with equal truth? Had the committee been directed to sign the certificate, would it not have been equally true as to those who signed it having counted the votes?

But now it is said that the certificate implies and proves that the President of the Senate exercised the power, and the sole power to judge and determine what should be counted.

It is said, and truly, that afterward for many years the certificates used were in this ancient form. So they were. I ask the Senate to inquire whether they meant, or were intended to mean, that he who signed them had exercised the power to judge and determine.—I turn to 1805. Aaron Burr was President of the Senate. In his bad eminence as depicted by the Senator from Ohio, he was clear-headed and intrepid, and was never charged with being diffident of prerogative or distrustful of himself.

I ask the Senate to hear what Aaron Burr said when the electoral certificates were to be opened.

Mr. MORTON. From what does the Senator read?

Mr. CONKLING. I read from the compilation on page 36:

Mr. Burr stated that pursuant to law there had been transmitted to him several packets, which, from the indorsements upon them, appeared to be the votes of the electors of a President and Vice-President; that the returns forwarded by mail as well as the duplicates sent by special messengers had been received by him in due time.

From this point, observe his words. He was addressing the Senators and Representatives.

You will now proceed, gentlemen, said he, to count the votes as the Constitution and laws direct, adding that, perceiving no cause for preference in the order of opening the returns, he would pursue a geographical arrangement.

Turn now to the certificate of this count on the next page, page 37. There is the ancient form copied, "the undersigned certifies that he has counted the votes," although fresh on his lips were the words, preserved in the same record, that the Constitution committed it to the representatives of the States and the representatives of the people to conduct the count, and beside these words, is the attested fact that the count was actually conducted by the two Houses through their tellers. Turn to the proceedings in 1817. Indiana had entered the Union. Indiana was a State. Her Senators sat here, and in the House of Representatives sat William Hendricks, the ancestor of one of the recent candidates for Vice-President. Mr. Taylor from the State of New York when her certificate was read, rose and said "I object to that vote." It was alleged that Indiana less observant of right and truth than she is now, had cast out her shoe over certain territory not her own; that she had overreached and taken something from a sister-State; some other irregularities were laid at her door, and her votes were objected to. What occurred? Did the President of the Senate assume to determine? No, sir. Mr. Varnum, a Representative from New York,—and there was no twenty-second joint rule then,—Mr. Varnum moved that the Houses separate to decide whether the votes should be counted or not. The two Houses did separate; they did debate; they did consider. Nobody suggested that the President of the Senate had anything in the world to do with it; but yet in 1817, as usual, we find the certificate identical throughout with the earliest one. The tellers made the enumeration; the two Houses conducted the count; the President of the Senate did nothing, except what he was commanded to do; the two Houses prescribed the form of the certificate; they directed him to sign it and he did sign it, and the certificate stated that he counted the votes. No doubt he did in the arithmetical sense; he heard the tabulation read; he looked at it; he was convinced of the correctness of the enumeration; he announced it to the Houses. Again, see what John Adams stated on the 3d of February, 1797. Committees had been appointed, as they always were from 1793, beforehand, for what? "To ascertain and report the mode in which the electoral vote should be examined"—a bald usurpation, if the President of the Senate had the right to examine—they had reported directing the President of the Senate, to do certain things, one of which was on receiving the count from the tellers to declare the result. When Mr. Adams came to perform his duty, speaking on his oath, and speaking that the nation might hear, what did he say? That he derived his power from the Constitution, that the Constitution conferred on him this high prerogative? O, no, sir:

In obedience to the Constitution and law of the United States and to the commands of both Houses of Congress expressed in their resolution passed at the present session, I now declare, et cetera.

At this point, as well as at any time, I may refer to a remark of Chancellor Kent, read yesterday by the Senator from Indiana, as if it were authority against the pending bill. This remark fell from the lips of the chancellor in one of the earlier addresses he made to college students. These lectures, when they began, were not designed as chapters of a law-book. Their author did not then know, that they were to be the germ of commentaries, which, growing in exactness and care, were to increase into one of the most famous and copious repositories of the law. They were designed originally to beguile the heaviness of unwonted and unwelcome leisure. The chancellor had left the bench at sixty, the constitutional limit; and as he says in some touching words which preface the earlier editions, he dreaded the heaviness of hours unemployed. He went into the Columbia Law School and held discourse mingled of history and jurisprudence, generalized and elementary dissertations designed to impart outlined instruction to beginners in the study of the law. I think I must have borrowed some of his words. Yes he says that "They are of that elementary kind which is not only essential to every person who pursues the science of the law as a practical profession, but is deemed useful and ornamental to gentlemen in every pursuit." Thus speaking to young men of affluence who were laying the foundations of culture at large, we observe that the language he employs is naturally inconclusive and regardless of judicial precision. What does he say:

In the case of questionable votes and a closely contested election, this power may be all important.

That is, the power to count. I stop a moment to remind those who think that the count is mere arithmetic, of the condemnation of such a view involved in these words.

In the case of questionable votes and a closely contested election, this power may be all important.

I submit that if everything, good, bad, and indifferent, is as we have been told to be counted, as the multiplication table is said, there would be no "questionable votes," nor would the power to count, be "all important," or important at all. The sentence continues:

And I presume, in the absence of all legislative provision on the subject that the President of the Senate counts the votes and determines the result, and that the two Houses are present only as spectators to witness the fairness and accuracy of the transaction, and to act only if no choice be made by the electors.

These words suggest three observations.

"I presume." I need not ask lawyers whether that is the deliberate and considered phrase of a great magistrate long accustomed to weigh questions in exact scales and to pronounce distinctly and definitely his judgment upon them? "I presume" is not the language of judicial conclusiveness or exactness. O no.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is a guess.

Mr. CONKLING. A guess, yes a guess—a pardonable form of speech when we remember the nature and object of the discourse. We next find these words: "In the absence of all legislative provision." Will any man who stands on the opinion of Chancellor Kent, after hearing these words, deny the power of the Houses to legislate? Or, to put the equivalent of the inquiry, will any man pretend in the face of these words that Chancellor Kent believed that the Constitution deposits with the President of the Senate this power?

If the Constitution in any way vests the power with the President of the Senate, that is the be-all and end-all of the matter: no legislative provision could touch it. If the chancellor believed the Constitution so provided, nothing could be more absurd than the words "in the absence of all legislative provision;" surely he knew that no legislative provision in such a case could have any more effect than the wind.

But again:

I presume in the absence of all legislative provision on the subject, that the President of the Senate counts the votes.

Yes, historically or in the sense of narrative he does; before these words were uttered by the chancellor nearly fifty years ago, historically and in the sense of narrative and in every sense essential to the truth of the statement, he did. So you, Mr. President, do a great many things, as your predecessors have done, by the acquiescence and command of the Houses. You appoint committees, not only of conference, but other committees. A standing rule of the Senate says the Senate shall appoint committees by ballot, does it not? But yet the President of the Senate appoints committees. How? He does it by the acquiescence of the body, as the organ of the body under the sanction of the body, just as he formerly signed the certificates to which I have referred.

In these instances the officer does not act in virtue of any right or power which inheres in him, independent of the Senate and its action conferring it.

The words of Chancellor Kent clearly indicate that in his opinion the examination of the electoral votes is within the law-making province. I beg to call attention to the view of the meaning of this passage from Kent, taken by others who are held in pleasant and respectful memory. In 1865 a warm debate over this clause of the Constitution occurred in the Senate. These words of Chancellor Kent were read, and Jacob Collamer of Vermont made some observations upon them. He said:

Nobody supposed that the Vice-President could exclude them.

That is, questioned votes—

But I was about to say that I never heard it doubted before that such a contingency, as might well happen because of the manner in which the constitutional provision was framed, could be provided for by legislation. Chancellor Kent, in the first volume of his Commentaries says

And then he quotes. Mr. Collamer resumes.

He admits that it is in the power of Congress to legislate, and doubts only whether in the absence of legislation there exists any department of the Government or any officer of the Government vested with power to count the votes and declare the result; and in relation to that he is only able to bring himself to state by way of opinion that he presumes the President of the Senate is to count the votes and declare the result. But he presumes that only in the absence of legislation. Legislation on the subject, therefore, according to the high authority of this distinguished jurist, is admissible, and of course within the power of Congress.

My eye falls here, Mr. President, on words uttered by your predecessor, Jacob M. Howard of Michigan, then a Senator, whose attainments as a lawyer were recognized by all who knew him, who was one of the leaders of the republican party, and who believed, and as you believe and as I believe in that party, in its usefulness and its mission, and in its record, resplendent as it is beyond any other in arduous and illustrious achievements. Mr. Howard said:

I confess I do not doubt the power of Congress, should they see fit, to authorize the President of the Senate to count the votes after he has opened the certificates; but in the absence of such a statutory provision I certainly could not concur in the "presumption" of Chancellor Kent, that the President of the Senate would have the right to count the votes and declare the result. It is impossible for me to concur in this intimation of that very distinguished authority. I should on the contrary, hold, in the absence of an act of Congress, that the duty of counting the votes devolved on the two Houses of Congress thus assembled.

Mr. President, I have paused at the resolution of 1787 and the proceeding of 1789, at the form of certificate then and long afterward used, and at the remark of Chancellor Kent, because these make up the trio of authorities usually cited of late to support the theory that the President of the Senate is appointed by the Constitution to conduct the electoral count.

I come now to review the practice of the nation for eighty-three years—from 1793 to 1877.

Until 1869, beginning in 1793, as often as electoral votes were to be counted, committees were raised by each House in advance to ascertain and report the mode in which the votes should be examined. The committees reported how the proceeding should be conducted, the report was adopted by each House, and one thing always provided for, was the appointment of tellers by each House.

The right of the Houses thus asserted, was never questioned. No President of the Senate, no member of either House, ever interposed a challenge. When the day to open the certificates arrived, the two Houses directed the proceeding throughout. The tellers counted. Every question which arose was referred to the Houses. The Houses framed the certificate; they directed it to be signed. He who signed it was the organ and representative of the two Houses.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, on account of the indisposition of my honorable friend from New York, who is not physically able to continue his speech at this present time, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business; and in making that motion I venture again to express the hope that we shall be able to-morrow certainly to finish this bill if it is to be finished at all.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I ask the Senator from Vermont to withdraw his motion that I may get a minute of the time of the Senate upon the bill for the revision of the laws. I ask that the Senate insist on the amendment to agree to the conference asked by the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont withdraw his motion for that purpose?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3156) to perfect the revision of the statutes of the United States, and asked a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

REVISION OF THE LAWS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives on the bill (H. R. No. 3156) to perfect the revision of the statutes of the United States, returned from the House with a message of non-concurrence and a request for a conference.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I move that the Senate insist and agree to the conference.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the committee; and Mr. BOUTWELL, Mr. CHRISTIANCY, and Mr. WALLACE were appointed.

HOUR OF MEETING.

On motion by Mr. EDMUNDS, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourn, it be until to-morrow at eleven o'clock.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After nine minutes spent in executive session, the doors were re-opened, and (at four o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 23, 1877.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read.

CORRECTION OF THE JOURNAL.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state to the House that he wishes to modify, in fact to change, his language of yesterday in one particular.

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a question which I believe I ought to state before the Chair addresses the House with regard to the correction, however, if the Chair will give me the same rights after he has made his statement, I shall be satisfied.

The SPEAKER. Certainly; the Chair is in that line himself. The Chair desires to modify, in fact to change, the statement made yesterday at the close of the session, that the resolution of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] would come up to-day as unfinished business.

Upon careful examination and after reflection, the Chair thinks that in that respect he was in error. He thinks that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KNOTT] waived his motion to adjourn; otherwise the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] would not have had the right to move a suspension of the rules. The motion to adjourn having been waived—that is to say, not having been insisted upon—the Chair then recognized the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] to move a suspension of the rules, which motion in effect took the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] off the floor. The message not having been subsequently disposed of, in the opinion of the Chair, it must be restored to the place where it was before it was read, that is, to the Speaker's table.

Mr. HOAR. The point to which I arose and upon which I proposed to address the Chair, was this: the intimation of the Chair yesterday, and to which the Chair has just referred, was not a ruling, strictly speaking, upon a question of parliamentary law; it was a statement of the Chair as to what would be the order of business the next day. Of course, the Chair could make a ruling upon that question only when the question should arise. It seems to me therefore not a correct practice to insert in the Journal as a ruling of the Chair a mere statement of the Chair of what would be his ruling in the future.

The suggestion that I desire to make, therefore, is that, as a record of the remarks of the Chair is preserved for the use of the House and for himself by our RECORD of debates, it is not proper to journalize the answer of the Chair to a parliamentary inquiry as to what will be the order of business at some future time. I would therefore suggest that that portion should be stricken from the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The Chair agrees with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] that no remarks of the Chair should go upon the Journal, that only the rulings of the Chair should be entered upon the Journal. The modification suggested will be made in that respect.

The Chair desires to state further that of course he does not this morning change any ruling that he made yesterday, but he wishes to modify, as he has done, the record in the Journal of the language of the Chair as to what would be the unfinished business this morning.

The Chair now rules that the unfinished business this morning is the report of the select committee upon the powers and privileges and duties of the House in regard to the electoral count, and that upon that question the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SEELYE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I have no wish to antagonize the Chair with reference to his decision upon this question. I presume that the Chair has since yesterday given the whole subject careful consideration and has come to the conclusion he has announced. I will merely say that in my judgment, I may err in that, after unanimous consent has been given by the House to the Chair to present a paper, of whatever character it may be, and after that paper has been read and is in possession of the House, and a member of the House takes the floor and submits a motion to refer that paper, it is very difficult to put it back again upon the Speaker's table unless the House shall so direct.

The SPEAKER. The Chair quite agrees with the gentleman from New York in his position with regard to any other day except Monday. But yesterday being Monday, the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] was taken from the floor in the manner provided for by the rule, by a motion of higher privilege than the one submitted by him.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I desire now to give notice that at the earliest practicable moment I will move to proceed to the consideration of business upon the Speaker's table, for the purpose of reaching and disposing of the President's message in question.

The SPEAKER. In answer to that the Chair would say that after the morning hour of to-day, or, if there be no morning hour to-day, then on any day when there is a morning hour, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] to submit that motion.

Mr. KASSON. A single word, if the Chair pleases, in order that the House may not be taken unawares. The Speaker observes that it has been the practice of the Chair, at the close of the day's session, and just before adjournment, when the House is not expecting any except merely formal action, to ask leave to lay certain papers before the House, and no member ever thinks of objecting to such a request by the Chair. If, however, a motion for the consideration of business on the Speaker's table is made in the regular way, at the close of the morning hour, then the whole House would be advised and prepared for any form of resolution that might be submitted. But the Chair will perceive that to hold the House strictly bound by that unanimous consent which is always granted at the request of the Chair, if it should turn out that there was some one on the floor prepared to submit an extraordinary motion, the House may be caught on almost any occasion without any preparation for action upon such a motion. Therefore I do not think it wise that the Chair should ask to entertain any but the most ordinary motion after such unanimous consent has been given to him. It is for that reason I call attention to the matter.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would state, in reply to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] that Rule 54 in effect is an obsolete rule. It has become a matter of unbroken practice that business upon the Speaker's table, at least so far as messages from the President and other executive communications are concerned, is not disposed of as provided in Rule 54, certainly not within the experience of the present occupant of the chair. On the contrary, it has been the practice for the occupant of the chair to dispose of messages and executive communications in just the same manner in which the present occupant of the chair disposed of them on yesterday. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] suggested yesterday, in substance, that he did not recollect any such action as this being taken on a Monday. The Chair has not had an opportunity to look very far back, but he finds that on January 25, 1875, which was a Monday, the same action took place as on yesterday, in regard to a communication concerning the alluvial basin of the Mississippi River.

Mr. KASSON. The same action?

The SPEAKER. The same as on yesterday.

Mr. KASSON. Was the question an ordinary motion of reference?

The SPEAKER. The Chair on a Monday asked unanimous consent, pending a waiver of a motion to adjourn, to lay before the House a communication from the President. But that is immaterial, except that the Chair desires——

Mr. KASSON. I only wish the Chair to state whether the motion in that case included any extraordinary action or extraordinary powers.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know whether it did; he thinks perhaps it did not; but that brings up another point, as to the extraordinary powers proposed to be conferred in this case by the resolution of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD.] The Chair ruled yesterday that that part of the resolution of the gentleman from New York was in order; and if the question should arise again and his ruling should be questioned, he will give at length his reasons for that ruling.

Mr. KASSON. The only desire I had this morning was to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that it would really be necessary to make some reservation in cases of this kind where unanimous consent is given only for ordinary reference, unless the Chair would call the special attention of the House to any matter involving more than the ordinary routine of reference. If there were an understanding that the Chair would do so, the interests of the House in granting unanimous consent in these cases would be thoroughly protected.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would much prefer that it should be distinctly understood that Rule 54 is to be adhered to or else that the unbroken practice as it has heretofore prevailed in the House shall continue. The Chair does not wish to obtrude business upon the House. But since the present occupant of the chair has been a member Rule 54 has never been observed in these respects, but communications of the character under consideration yesterday have been referred upon being laid before the House by unanimous consent.

Mr. KASSON. Undoubtedly by general consent the rule has been waived.

The SPEAKER. And in the opinion of the Chair the practice has tended directly to the expedition of business. If there were not some ready means of this kind for clearing the Speaker's table of these communications, not only would the House in many cases remain for an indefinite time uninformed upon subjects on which it had asked information, but these communications would be piled up to such an extent upon the Speaker's table as to make it impossible perhaps to keep them in the order of their reception.

Mr. KASSON. I do not wish the Chair to understand me as objecting to the practice. I only desire that under this practice, when sanctioned by unanimous consent upon the request of the Chair, we shall not be suddenly met by any extraordinary resolution offered from the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair so understands. He was only raising the question whether it was the desire of the House that Rule 54 should be considered as prescribing the right method of disposing of these messages. Unless there is further objection, the Journal, as modified, will be approved.

Mr. HARTZELL. I rise to make a correction in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Heretofore it has been ruled that the correction of the RECORD is not a privileged question; but since the reporters have become, in the fullest sense, officers of the House, the Chair is inclined to believe that the correction of the RECORD is, equally with the correction of the Journal, a privileged question. He therefore recognizes the gentleman to make such a correction.

Mr. HARTZELL. The RECORD reports me as not voting on the call of the yeas and nays upon the adoption of the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. SEELYE.] I was present and voted "yea" on that resolution.

The SPEAKER. The correction will be made, and the Journal, in which the same error occurs, will also be corrected.

The Journal, as corrected, was approved.

NAVAL POLICY OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. By order of the House, on the 10th instant, the bill (H. R. No. 4389) to authorize the formation of a mixed commission to inquire and report as to the future naval policy of the United States was made a special order for this day. I ask unanimous consent that this order be postponed for one week, to retain the same powers and privileges which it would have to-day.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I object, unless it is understood that the bill, when it comes up in regular order, shall be open for amendment.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. That was the understanding when the order was made.

The SPEAKER. There being no objection, the order asked by the gentleman from Tennessee will be made.

THE ELECTORAL VOTE.

Mr. PIERCE. I ask unanimous consent to present a memorial of merchants of Boston, praying for the adoption of the proposed plan reported by the joint committee for counting the electoral vote. As this paper is very brief, I ask that it be read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I object.

Mr. PIERCE. I hope the country will take notice that the gentleman from New York objects to everything of this kind.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I hope so too. I am acting in the view of the country.

UNITED STATES AND MEXICAN COMMISSION.

Mr. SWANN. I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to present a communication from the Secretary of State, touching the commission under the convention between the United States and Mexico of July 4, 1868. I ask unanimous consent that the communication be recommitted and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. The communication will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, January 19, 1877.

SIR: I have the honor to invite the attention of your honorable committee to the necessity of making provision for and carrying into effect the awards made by the commission under the convention between the United States and Mexico of July 4, 1868.

The commission has closed its labors, and awards have been made against Mexico in favor of citizens of the United States to the amount of $4,125,622.20.

Awards were made against the United States in favor of the citizens of Mexico to the amount $150,498.41.

By the terms of the treaty, the first payment on account by the Government against which the larger amount has been awarded is payable on or before the last day of this month.

A very recent dispatch from our minister in Mexico states he has assurances from the gentleman in charge of the foreign office that the payment will be made.

An appropriation by Congress will be necessary for the payment of the amount of the awards against the United States, which sum, by the terms of the treaty, is to be deducted from the awards against Mexico, and from the amount to be paid by Mexico.

Provision should also be made for the distribution among the several parties entitled of the money as it may be received, and also for the re-imbursement to the United States of the amount paid by the United States toward the joint expenses of the commission, and which by the terms of the treaty is to be deducted from the awards. This sum amounts to $114,943.74 paid by the United States, Mexico having paid $63,789.72 of such joint expenses, the total expenses chargeable to the joint commission under the provision of the treaty having been $178,738.46, being less than 5 per cent. on the whole amount of the awards.

The amount chargeable to the joint commission as above does not constitute the whole amount paid by the United States, as each government bore the expenses of its respective agent and of its clerical force, and expenses of translation, &c.

I inclose herewith a copy of the final account between the two governments, and of the protocol signed on the 14th day of December last; and also a draught of a bill entitled "An act to provide for the distribution of the awards made under the convention between the United States of America and the republic of Mexico, concluded on the 4th day of July, 1868," which I venture to submit to the consideration of your honorable committee.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

HAMILTON FISH.

Hon. THOMAS SWANN,
Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. SWANN. I move that communication from the Secretary of State, together with the accompanying documents, be printed and recommitted to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The SPEAKER. Not to be brought back by motion to reconsider.

The motion was agreed to.

IMPROVEMENT OF SOUTH PASS OF MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported back a communication from the Secretary of War in reference to the settlement in favor of J. B. Eads for the improvement of the South Pass of the Mississippi River, and moved that, together with the accompanying papers, it be ordered to be printed and recommitted.

The motion was agreed to.

JOINT COMMITTEE ELECTORAL BILL.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to present at this time a memorial in favor of the passage of the bill reported by the joint committee of the two Houses for counting the electoral vote, and ask that it be read and spread upon the record.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I object.

Mr. WILLIS. Let it appear that the republicans object.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Yes; you are the man who charged a conspiracy against republicans.

Mr. WILLIS. Yes, and you are one of the conspirators.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. As well might Julian the apostate make charges against Christianity.

The SPEAKER. This discussion is all out of order.

GEORGE C. ELLISON, CHIEF ENGINEER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. WILLIS. I ask unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution for reference to the Committee of Accounts.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House pay, and is hereby authorized and directed to pay, out of the contingent fund, to George C. Ellison, chief engineer of the House of Representatives, to indemnify him for moneys expended by him and incurred by him in and about certain legal proceedings in defending the title and retaining the possession of certain property belonging to the National Government in his custody as an officer of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. As I understand it, this is a resolution introduced simply for reference to the Committee of Accounts.

Mr. WILLIS. That is all.

There was no objection; and the resolution was received and referred to the Committee of Accounts.

MR. C. W. BUTTZ SWORN IN.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege, and present a report from the Committee of Elections in the case of C. W. Buttz, from the Second Congressional District of South Carolina, and ask that the report and accompanying resolution be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee of Elections, to whom was referred the case of C. W. Buttz, under a resolution of the House, report:

That the said C. W. Buttz having produced before said committee what purports to be a certificate of election for the unexpired term in the Forty-fourth Congress from the second congressional district of South Carolina, and having produced and filed before said committee the certificate under seal of the supreme court of South Carolina, showing that said Buttz did receive a majority of the votes cast at the election held to fill the vacancy in said second congressional district of South Carolina, without deciding upon the validity of said first-named certificate, are of the opinion that said Buttz is entitled prima facie to a seat in the Forty-fourth Congress from said congressional district, and would recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That C. W. Buttz has a prima facie title to a seat in this House as a member of the Forty-fourth Congress from the second congressional district of South Carolina for the unexpired term.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I demand the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Mr. Buttz is present in the House, and I ask that he be sworn in.

Mr. BUTTZ, accompanied by his colleague, Mr. HOGE, appeared in front of the Speaker's desk, and was duly qualified by taking the customary oath.

PRIVILEGES, ETC., OF THE HOUSE IN COUNTING THE ELECTORAL VOTES.

Mr. HOLMAN. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The House resumes the consideration of the report submitted by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. KNOTT,] from the select committee on the privileges, powers, and duties of the House of Representatives in counting the vote for President and Vice-President of the United States; and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SEELYE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SEELYE. Before proceeding, Mr. Speaker, I ask that the resolutions reported from the committee be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, First. That the Constitution of the United States does not confer upon the President of the Senate the power to examine and ascertain the votes to be counted as the electoral votes for President and Vice-President of the United States.

Second. That the only power which the Constitution of the United States confers upon the President of the Senate in respect to the electoral votes for President and Vice-President of the United States is to receive the sealed lists transmitted to him by the several electoral colleges, to keep the same safely, and to open all the certificates or those purporting to be such in the presence of the Senate and the House of Representatives.

Third. That the Constitution of the United States does confer upon the Senate and the House of Representatives the power to examine and ascertain the votes to be counted as the electoral votes.

Fourth. That in the execution of their power in respect to the counting of the electoral vote the House of Representatives is at least equal with the Senate.

Fifth. That in the counting of the electoral votes, no vote can be counted against the judgment and determination of the House of Representatives.

Mr. SEELYE. Mr. Speaker, the resolutions offered by the committee are several, but the question underlying them all is single, and is, in my judgment, one of the gravest which this Congress is likely to consider. Simply stated, that question is whether one branch of Congress can be the sole judge of the lawfulness of rejecting what purports to be an electoral vote; and this, stripped of all its guises and seen in its naked issue, is the question, whether a single branch of Congress, which, in a certain contingency, is to elect the President or the Vice-President of the United States, has authority to decide without the concurrence and against the judgment of the other House whether the contingency which confers upon it this great power and high responsibility has come. In other words, has the House of Representatives the right to make the opportunity which puts the election of the President of the United States in its own power? This is the single issue of all these resolutions, which four members of the committee reporting them affirm and three deny. If it be a right at all, it is a constitutional right, and it becomes this House before clothing itself with these solemn functions to consider well whether the Constitution has left at our option so sacred an investiture.

It would be impertinent for me, Mr. Speaker, in this presence, as well as impossible, to discuss this subject as a constitutional lawyer; neither is this necessary. I shall therefore leave the more purely legal aspects of the question to my distinguished associates and confine myself to some general considerations, determinative of the result, which it may not be improper for me to present, in which, however, I shall not presume to instruct the members of this House, but only to remind them, and that briefly, of what may be as familiar to them as to myself.

There are some things quite apparent, even to a superficial student of our constitutional history, and which a profounder study only makes more clear. The care with which the framers of our Constitution sought to guard the independence—each in its sphere—of the three co-ordinate functions of the Government, is not only admitted by every student, but admired by every statesman. Indeed, there is hardly any one feature of the Constitution more prominent, and certainly there is no one more carefully elaborated, than the clear discrimination with which it marks out the legislative, the executive, and the judicial powers and duties respectively; and in reading the debates in the convention by which the Constitution was formed, I think what impresses one more forcibly than anything else is the solicitude exercised that these three departments of the Government should be in the fullest sense co-ordinate with each other, and subordinate only to the Constitution and the will of the people. We therefore undermine the very ground-work of the Constitution when we give to either one of these three powers any absolute control over either of the others. It is true these three departments are not and cannot be absolutely independent of each other. But their dependence is reciprocal, each yielding as much as it receives. They are not sticks of a fagot, but branches of a tree. Their relation is organic, and their dependence an interdependence. The eye cannot say unto the hand, I have no need of thee; nor again, the head to the feet, I have no need of you. But this interdependence does not make one the creature of another and cannot transfer to one the privileges, the powers, or the duties which belong to another.

While all this is apparent as a general truth, nothing can be plainer, as a particular point, than that the framers of our Constitution did not intend that Congress should have anything to do with determining who should be President, except in the improbable and rare contingency that the people should fail to determine it themselves. In reading the debates of the convention of 1787, we find constantly recognized what Mr. Gouverneur Morris called "the indispensable necessity of making the Executive independent of the Legislature," and also what Mr. Pierce Butler called "the sure prevalence of cabal, faction, and violence," if the election of the Executive were put in the hands of the Legislature. It was because of this very danger that the election of President was put just as far from the reach of Congress as was possible, and was conferred upon electors, to be chosen in each State "in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct." And with the same wise caution it was provided that the electoral votes, when cast, should be confided to the custody of an officer who, though in cases of necessity he might belong to and be chosen from one branch of the legislative power, would in general, as Vice-President of the United States, be beyond legislative control. It is this officer who is to open, in the presence of the Senate and the House of Representatives, the electoral votes; but—said Mr. Charles Pinckney, who, if any man could speak with authority on this point—

It never was intended—

nor could it have been safe in the Constitution to have given to Congress thus assembled in convention the right to object to any vote, or even to question whether they were constitutionally or properly given. This right of determining on the manner in which the electors shall vote, the inquiry into the qualifications, and the guards that are necessary to prevent disqualified or improper men voting and to insure the votes being legally given, rests and is exclusively vested in the State Legislatures. If it is necessary to have guards against improper elections of electors and to institute tribunals to inquire into their qualifications, with the State Legislatures, and with them alone, rests the power to institute them, and they must exercise it. To give to Congress, even when assembled in convention, a right to reject or admit the votes of States, would have been so gross and dangerous an absurdity as the framers of the Constitution never could have been guilty of. How could they expect that in deciding on the election of a President, particularly where such election was strongly contested, party spirit would not prevail and govern every decision? Did they not know how easy it was to raise objections against the votes of particular elections, and that in determining upon these it was more than probable the members would recollect their sides, their favorite candidate, and sometimes their own interests? Or must they not have supposed that in putting the ultimate and final decision of the electors in Congress, who were to decide irrevocably and without appeal, they would render the President their creature and prevent his assuming and exercising that independence in the performance of his duties upon which the safety and honor of the Government must forever rest?

It is also Mr. Pinckney's language, "that no power or authority is given to Congress, even when both Houses are assembled in convention, further than to open and to count the votes and declare who are President and Vice-President, if an election has been made;" "that so far from appointing committees to receive memorials or petitions respecting the election or decide upon it, or so far from having any right to delegate an authority on this subject, Congress shall not themselves, even when in convention, have the smallest power to decide on a single vote."

Is it not therefore a libel upon the letter and an entire reversal of the spirit of the Constitution to affirm that either House may insist that its own view of the informality or illegality of the electoral votes cast, or of the condition of things in the State where they were cast, is to prevail against the clear face of the votes themselves and against the pronounced judgment of the other House? This doctrine seems to me, Mr. Speaker, to be both monstrous and revolutionary. I have no better words to express the view in which I think it should be held than those used in the Senate by the distinguished and accomplished Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] March 13, 1876, when he pronounced this very doctrine "an utter usurpation, utterly without warrant in the Constitution, dangerous in the extreme, and threatening to overthrow that spirit of popular government which all over underlies the frame-work of our system."

Such a doctrine destroys the restraints with which the Congress is so carefully hedged by the Constitution; it subverts the independence which the Constitution is so careful to confer upon the Executive; of two powers of the Government originally intended to be co-ordinate it gives the opportunity for the one to be made the creature of the other, and therefore the very groundwork and frame-work of the Government itself has been changed. How long then will our other institutions be likely to remain as they are? How long before the eagerness of a party or the exigencies of an administration fertile in expedients and facile in their exercise, as we know these to be, will contrive on any occasion reasons for discarding the vote of a State, and how long before the exceptions to this rule shall become the rule itself, and the election of President and Vice-President by the people of these United States has become a thing of the past forever? These are far from being impossible contingencies. Human nature is always engaged in throwing away its privileges. Neither nations nor individual men, neither institutions nor laws, neither arts nor literatures nor civilizations nor sciences have ever shown themselves incapable of deterioration, have ever, in fact, shown themselves capable of maintaining their advancement save as they are held thereto by some outside power. Retrogression is much easier and much more frequent in this world than progress, and we cannot afford to throw away any of our safeguards.

I know we are told that by this very doctrine as embodied in the so-called twenty-second joint rule the counting of the electoral votes in the last three presidential elections has been controlled, and in the admiration which men of democratic antecedents have for this specimen of republican administration, I almost find prefigured some of the millennial glories where the lion shall eat straw like the ox; but I care not what party contrived the measure, nor what party proposes to continue it, the doctrine is foreign to our Constitution, it may be fatal to our liberties, and every party ought to denounce it. I am neither surprised nor displeased that the mischief which now threatens us from the application of this very doctrine comes down upon the pate of the party which first brought it into play, and I shall be no more surprised than displeased at the same mischief coming irreversibly in its turn upon the pate of whatever party shall decide to uphold it. For in this world God reigns, much as our conduct ignores the fact, and therefore justice and retribution are no figments of fancy, but supreme realities to whose sway nations and parties as well as individual men must in the long run yield.

But how have we come upon a theory so different from what was held by the framers of and the early actors under our Constitution? How is it that it has become so easy for persons at the present day to argue that Congress has any power over these electoral votes, power even to count them, power to reject them, power to go behind them and inquire into the conditions under which they were cast? And how is it that persons on this floor, constitutional lawyers and students, can gravely contend not only that Congress has the right, in concurrent action of both branches, to go back of the returns which a State has sent here, but that a single branch of Congress can do this, and that either House has the right by itself alone to reject a duly returned electoral vote? I think the answer to this question, Mr. Speaker, is clear, but I do not find it wholly in partisan prejudice or passion, potent as these forces might be to produce such a result at the present time. I find it rather in that tendency of all constitutional governments whereby the legislative power is constantly encroaching upon the executive and judicial powers, and which, though undoubtedly to a certain degree compatible with liberty, is liable to the same excesses and the same dangers as when the throne or the judgment-seat has shaken off the restraints of law. Indeed, I sometimes think that the ease with which legislation may assume for itself not only the enactment but the interpretation and the enforcement of law is one of the greatest dangers with which our modern state is threatened. It is at least one of the most prominent facts of our modern civilization. In France the executive is made dependent for his election upon the legislature. In Great Britain the executive has become practically merged in the legislature and has ceased to be a co-ordinate factor of the government. The House of Commons is practically the executive as much as it is the legislative power of the British realm. In our own country the dissension between Congress and President Johnson has shown clearly enough that when Congress chooses it has the President in its power. Like illustrations, in our own history and elsewhere, of the encroachments of the legislative upon the judicial power will occur to every one. Now, when the law-making power becomes the only power, finding in its own voice the only interpreter of its decrees, and in its own arm their only executioner, it matters not whether this law-making power is vested in an assembly or an autocrat, it becomes in either case a despotism. And I think that an assembly, with nothing to control it, is a much more dangerous tyrant than an autocrat, for there is a certain sense of responsibility to an unseen tribunal, a certain sense of that law which, as Sophocles says in the Antigone, is not of to-day or of yesterday, and no man can tell whence it came or when it came, a certain sense of divine justice, which a single will invested with high power is quite likely in some degree to feel, and which an assembly of many wills may be quite as likely to disregard. The reason for this is found in the fact that responsibility always individualizes a man, it belongs to him in his single personality, and, unless carefully guarded, association with others for common ends is more likely to weaken an individual's sense of responsibility than to strengthen it. Hence there is danger to our future liberty and our future law in this steady stride of our modern life toward the supremacy of the Legislature. And I call upon gentlemen here to pause in this movement, to pause at least sufficiently to ponder its tendencies and its perils, and to pause long and ponder well before taking the step, so easily forborne but so difficult to retrace, committing us to that interpretation of the Constitution which, carried to its legitimate results, may at any time make the President of the United States the creature and the tool of the House of Representatives.

If I read it right, Mr. Speaker, the vital element of our Constitution as a whole and which shapes it in all its parts is that the sovereignty of these United States is not found in the legislative or in the executive or in the judicial branch of the Government, singly or all combined, but in the will of the people of these United States, of which the Constitution is only the expression, and by which it is expected that the Congress, the President, and the courts shall ultimately all be controlled. But we may make a great mistake respecting this will of the people if we do not remember that it is the will of the people of the States; of States bound indeed in a Federal Union and growing from generation to generation into a more perfectly organized national life, but possessing, each in its sphere and under the limitations which the Constitution provides, its own way of expressing the will of its people. And that way must be guarded, not merely because the Constitution requires it, but because it is equally requisite for the life of the individual State and for the very existence of the nation itself. I think no thoughtful person, looking at the prospective growth of this country and noting the divergent interests already prominent in our national life, and certain to grow with our growth, will expect a body so vast and so various as ours must soon become to be kept together—I will not say kept in strength and vigor—by any centralized government, whatever its fleets and armies or power of any sort might be. Destroy among us the principle of local self-government, obliterate State prerogatives and State distinctions, and the nation, which has grown out of the States and which lives and flourishes only as they give it nourishment and strength, dies like a tree severed from its vivifying roots. And just so far as we encroach unduly upon these State prerogatives and hamper, either by congressional legislation or by executive interference, that local self-government which is our original Anglo-Saxon birthright and which has been from the first our choicest American privilege, we have not increased the strength of the body by thus absorbing the strength of its members; rather does the body itself grow weak as they become weakened, as it is itself destroyed when they are destroyed. I would be most careful, therefore, in these most momentous inquiries now pressing upon our attention, not to forget that the sovereign authority to which in a presidential election we are to bow is not simply the will of the American people taken as a whole, but the will of the people of these United States, singly and separately expressed, each State expressing it in its own way, each with all the rights of any to regulate the forms and procedure under which its election shall be held, and all the States entitled to claim, in the fullest and most literal sense, the privilege guaranteed in Section 1, Article II, of the Constitution to each State, that it shall appoint its presidential electors "in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct." If we do not like the way adopted, each State has still the right to adopt its own way, with which no other State has the right to interfere, and which the Representatives of all the other States are to accept unquestioningly. We cannot change by act of Congress either the way in which a State has cast its vote or the way in which that State has chosen to verify and return its vote. If the methods which a State adopts are obnoxious to us and we wish to change them, there is only one way in which it can lawfully be done; the way which shows the radical difference between a constitutional government and a despotism in that under the one reforms are sought by amendment and under the other by revolution.

If this were the proper time I should like to speak of the way in which the late election was, in some localities, conducted, though I fear my words would give no salve to any sore from which either party in that contest is now suffering. Amid the confused and conflicting testimony now crowding upon us from contending committees of the Senate and this House, majorities and minorities of either House and, so far as yet appears, of all the committees contradicting each other, the only fact, as yet, which stands out clear and beyond dispute is that in certain quarters during the late election both parties—leaders and led—acted just as wrongfully as they could, restrained by no conscience, by no sense of honor or rectitude, by nothing but the sheer impossibility of doing worse. This, in my judgment, is far from being true of the country at large. I doubt if any similar occasion ever presented so grand an exhibition of the self-possession of a great people as did our late election, taken as a whole. It was preceded, doubtless, by heated discussions, wherein passion often took the place of argument, and partisanship increased the prejudices behind which it was intrenched, but it was attended in the main by such calmness, such self-control, such decorum, such dignity that an American may be pardoned for pride as he points at it. Honestly and intelligently, in most localities, were cast those potent instruments

> That come down as still
> As snow-flakes fall upon the sod;
> But execute a freeman's will
> As lightning does the will of God.

But this ought not to blind us to the fact indisputably proved, that in certain quarters the whole procedure of the election was a shame and disgrace, amply justifying well nigh all the charges which either party makes upon the other. This at least is clear, whatever else may be in doubt, and when representatives of the two parties on this floor indulge in their criminations and recriminations on this point, it is only the old story of the pot and the kettle, the charge, by whichever side begun, being perfectly met by the rejoinder. I admit the chicanery, the corruption, the cruelty put forth in certain quarters on either side to control the late election. No honest man in his senses can deny these. But a wrong only grows to greater wrongs if we seek to right it save in a righteous way. And these violations of law which we now deplore will only multiply themselves hereafter, finding in fresh occasions increased incentives, if we undertake to treat them after any other method than what the Constitution and the laws prescribe.

Mr. Speaker, the question who is to be President of the United States for the next four years is a very ephemeral one. We ourselves may wonder, before even that time has ended, that it should now have given us such concern. But the question how the President shall be chosen and declared, the question of the rights of the States and the duties of Congress concerning the Chief Executive, the question whether the Constitution and the laws shall be maintained in their original spirit until they shall have been amended, these are questions of permanent power. They stretch their hands through the coming time and lay their grasp on generations yet to be. But we shall never answer them as we should till we rise above the low view which simply seeks to discover which one of two parties has the right to the Presidency. Properly considered, the question of the Presidency is not so much a question of rights or possessions or privileges, but of obligation. It is not what a certain man or a certain party may claim, but what claim is righteously laid upon him and upon them by the solemn voice of the sovereign will of the people of these United States. The Presidency of this people, of these States, is not a great dignity to be enjoyed so much as it is a high and sacred trust to be administered; and if we can only look upon it in this light, as we should, it ceases to be a prize for which we are contending, and which a man or a party may claim as his or theirs, but is seen to be a post of sacred duty, from which it behooves neither the man nor the party to shrink, and for which it behooves neither the man nor the party to strive. If we could only rise to this high plane of contemplation and put beneath a patriot's feet the clouds which are ever over a partisan's head, the darkness would be gone and the sunlight would be all around us. Then should we show that these institutions of our fathers have not become the inheritance of unworthy sons, but are to be transmitted from us as they have been received from them, with their luster undimmed, their strength unabated, themselves the joy of coming generations.

I hope the reality of this picture is already assured by the action of the joint committee of the Senate and the House of Representatives, to whose report we so lately listened, a report so thoughtful, so sagacious, and of a patriotism so lofty and so pure, that, if it could be ratified by this Congress with the unanimity with which it has been reported by the committee, I think it would shed a glory over the opening year of the second century of our Independence which not even any year of the first century could excel. This report justifies the action of the minority of the committee on the privileges, powers, and duties of the House in counting the electoral votes, and renders the resolutions reported by the majority nugatory. I cannot believe that this House will refuse its ratification. I wish we could tell the world unanimously that the same great and free people who so lately showed themselves so great by leaving to peaceful arbitration a threatening international dispute have in the dissensions which now divide them shown themselves still greater by ceasing all disputes about their rights in order that they might learn and yield to their obligations. I know of nothing great which such a people might not do, and nothing glorious which they might not become. Such a deed would bind us in a union closer than before, and would justify, as nothing in our history has yet done, the expectation—sometimes seeming like a dream—that the sun which this morning gathered his pavilion from the mists which rose around Mount Katahdin, and which to-night shall draw the curtains of his setting from the clouds which veil the Golden Gate, shall through the coming centuries look down upon this broad land and see the many States and the teeming hosts who people them still as now e pluribus unum, one law of justice over all, and the same liberty of love enjoyed by all.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. U. S. GRANT, jr., one of his secretaries.

PRIVILEGES, ETC., OF THE HOUSE IN COUNTING THE ELECTORAL VOTE.

Mr. SEELYE. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. WILLIAMS.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SEELYE] has twenty minutes of his hour remaining.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. I understood that I was also to have twenty minutes of the time of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BURCHARD.]

The SPEAKER. The understanding of the Chair was that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] had yielded the twenty minutes remaining of his hour to his colleague, [Mr. HURLBUT.]

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I understand that my colleague [Mr. HURLBUT] has yielded his time to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The SPEAKER. Then it is the understanding of the Chair that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WILLIAMS] will have forty minutes in all.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the line of remark which I had laid out for myself to pursue upon this question went clear of all partisan feelings or personal allusions. Least of all did I expect to notice formally anything which might have been said on the other side of the Chamber. But, sir, it seems that gentlemen there regard no constitutional argument quite complete which is not freely interlarded with charges of conspiracy, foul and dark, against the leaders of the republican party; and when anathemas in this direction are exhausted, there stands the ever-convenient returning board of Louisiana, upon whose devoted head imprecations may be piled with impunity. I think, sir, that this mode of argument reached its climax in this Chamber when the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WILLIS,] on Saturday last, indulged in a vein of remark which I now pause to notice, and my motive for so doing will presently appear. I quote a few detached sentences from his speech as specimen bricks of the whole structure. He said:

> We have universal suffrage. No man is denied the elective franchise. No man is exempt from the responsibility which its exercise imposes.

He proceeds:

> But, gentlemen, when unprincipled party leaders recovered from the shock of their defeat they conjured up a fiend in their hearts.
>
> They had a Chief Magistrate already practiced in assaults upon the rights of his countrymen, who had already caused every honest cheek to blush with shame and every honest heart to throb with madness by the use of bayonet and cannon in suppressing the voice of the people. * * * O, how American manhood is debased, how American soldiership is sullied by the example of a Ruger! Unhappy Republic, when the defenders of its people become their oppressors!

He said, speaking of the President:

> He evidently had learned a lesson from Cæsar Borgia, who, after conquering Romagna, appointed Ramiro d'Orco as governor and gave him limitless authority. He oppressed the people by his baseness and cruelty; when Cæsar Borgia, who had instigated all, intent only upon his schemes, with a view of escaping the reproaches which were justly his due, caused Ramiro to be massacred in the market-place, before the eyes of all the people.
>
> In Ruger he found another Ramiro.

I bear the gentleman from New York no feeling of unkindness or disrespect. But, Mr. Speaker, may I inquire in all seriousness, is this the language of a statesman or the ravings of a maniac? [Laughter.] General Thomas H. Ruger is my own townsman. His residence is in my own city. There his father, brothers, and family reside, and there I have known him almost from boyhood. Knowing him as I do, knowing his sterling qualities as a gentleman, his bravery as a soldier, his standing in the Army, and his devotion to his country, while I might owe an apology to him for turning aside to dignify with notice an assault so unjust and uncalled-for as this, I will never sit quietly in my seat here and fail to characterize it as I think it deserves. What is the historical parallel which the gentleman from New York has so flippantly brought forward?

Who was Cæsar Borgia, with whom he so gaily compares the Chief Magistrate of the United States? An Italian by birth, of Spanish extraction, with the hot blood of the one and the savage cruelty of the other. He ravaged with fire and slaughter the papal states, beheaded petty sovereigns, poisoned Pope and cardinals, and caused his own brother to be slain, whose body was found in the Tiber with nine stiletto-stabs in the breast. He besieged Sinigaglia with his Swiss mercenaries and enacted such scenes of treachery and inhuman cruelty as have no parallel in pagan or Christian history, if you except the horrid massacre of Fort Pillow and the hellish murders of Hamburgh.

What, sir, has the President of the United States done that he should be compared to a monster like this? And what has General Ruger done that he should be styled a Ramiro, who was selected by the tyrant for his baseness and cruelty and was drawn and quartered in the market-place in the presence of all the people? Why, sir, when a lawless and angry mob had invaded the State-house in New Orleans, trampled the statutes of the State under foot, ignored the clear right of the clerk of the house of representatives to call that body to order, and, in defiance of all law and all authority, was determined to install itself as the Legislature of the State—it was then when human passions were seething like a caldron and it was apparent that if no interference was had in all human probability within the space of twenty minutes' time that State-house would be drenched in blood, and perhaps the Crescent City itself given to the flames, that the President of the United States, both in wisdom and in mercy, stretched forth the hand of power to save the shedding of human blood!

And for that act, sir, he is denounced on this floor as a Cæsar Borgia! And when, in Columbia, South Carolina, the members of the rifle clubs were straining at the leash and thirsting for blood, when in five minutes' more time the steps of that State-house would undoubtedly have been made slippery with human gore, and General Ruger in very mercy put forth just power enough to prevent it, he is denominated by the gentleman from New York [Mr. WILLIS] as the Ramiro, a Cæsar Borgia selected to execute his hellish intents!

But, sir, I will not believe that the gentleman from New York could have intended his language in its full scope and meaning. If I thought he did, if I thought any gentleman on this floor was wild enough and reckless enough to use language like that deliberately, I do not know how I could characterize it as it would deserve. Why, sir, to compare General Thomas H. Ruger, with his modest deportment, undaunted courage, and conscientious fidelity to duty, with any man who could deliberately utter language like that would be like comparing heaven to a brick-yard. [Laughter.] But I stand here to defend the gentleman from New York from any such imputation. He never could have used the language naturally. He might have had some pardonable vanity, begetting a desire to give his speech touch and tone by some quotation from the mediæval classics. Some rhythm in the words may have betrayed him; he may have used them in the sense which I once heard of a very devoted but somewhat illiterate gentleman doing, who when addressing the Throne of Grace commenced "Great and abominible Lord," &c., and when called to order and reprimanded for his language he said, "I meant no blasphemy; I only thought the word had a sort of a heavenly sound about it." [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, here and hereafter may we not call a truce to all this vein of remark. I stand not here to defend Ulysses S. Grant, President of the United States. I have criticised some of the minor details of his Administration as freely and fully as any one, but upon its great measures, his financial plans, his foreign policy, his merciful and wise treatment of the Southern States of this Republic, and the deathless record of his military fame, he needs no defender, for he is his own best defender. And I tell the gentleman from New York in all kindness that in these things he will remain unharmed and unscathed by any who, choosing to leave the republican party, intrench themselves within the ranks of its enemy, and from democratic ramparts shoot poisoned arrows which fall pointless at his feet.

Again I say, in common decency and in the name of manhood and the honor of our country, a truce to this abuse of its Chief Magistrate; criticise his public acts if you will, but spare these personal assaults. Why, sir, he had hardly been seated in the executive chair when his daughter, then a mere child traveling in Europe, was paraded and criticised in the public prints; his two boys at college were assailed and maligned, and both wife and children were rudely brought out from the retiracy of home and dragged before the public gaze. It was a safe, if not a manly thing to do. You might strike him in his tenderest feelings, outrage him in the dearest and most sacred relations of life, he could not reply; no man occupying his position could do that. But I tell the gentleman from New York, and all others who follow in his wake, that this country will remember its defenders, and that he may quote Cæsar Borgia, and Ramiro to his dying day, but the names of Grant and Ruger are emblazoned in gratitude and in glory on the escutcheons of this Republic and there they will remain when their traducers are gone and shall have been forgotten. [Applause.]

Now, sir, this has become a very queer constitutional discussion [Laughter.] For one I regret that it has seemed necessary. I say to the gentleman from New York, I cherish no ill-will toward him; on the contrary, I have rather admired his genial ways. If he should feel hard toward me, as this is a period of compromise, I tender him in that spirit the story I once heard of the bovine and the fool. It was said that the former seeing the latter trespassing upon his domain pursued him to the center of the field, when to his utter astonishment his supposed non-resistant victim turned upon him, and seizing him, with sled-stake in hand, belabored his sides until, his bovine majesty bellowing at every bound, his assailant exclaimed: "Who began it? who began it? who began it?" [Great laughter.]

Sir, I gladly return from this unpleasant digression to pursue the line of remarks I had originally intended.

Mr. Speaker, the peril which the leading statesmen of this country have predicted might arise whenever the time should come that one electoral vote would decide a presidential contest has fallen upon us at last, and found us unprepared.

The danger of revolution, which Mr. Seward said "must be seen to arise from the possibility that injustice may occur in cases where the law has not provided with sufficient care for ascertaining the will of the people," is the danger which confronts us to-day.

For more than half a century eminent men in both Houses of Congress have pointed out the danger and dwelt upon the necessity for providing against it; yet up to this very hour the question has been met only to be evaded, and has been dodged when it should have been decided.

Sir, may we not at least hope that the venerated wisdom of the fathers and the sleepless vigilance of our predecessors here shall not be quoted upon us this time, while in the midst of partisan heat, with vast interests clamoring for the mastery, and human passions raging like a sea, we diligently seek some reasonable interpretation of that clause of the Constitution which was born in vagueness and left in uncertainty?

Mr. Speaker, if there was ever a time when the soul of the patriot and the mind of the statesman should rise above all partisan considerations, that time is in the Forty-fourth Congress and in the second session of its life.

Webster said that a question well stated was half argued. While none of us may hope to emulate his great powers of generalization and statement, yet the humblest of us may act upon the hint and determine, as well as we can, the real question in dispute. That clause of the Constitution which forms at once the cause of the difficulty and affords the only means of relief reads as follows:

> The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted.

Counted by whom? By the President of the Senate? By the two Houses of Congress? By the President and two Houses combined? Or by some independent person or body to be designated by law?

Two things are certain: whoever shall perform the act, the thing to be done is to "count;" only that, and nothing more; and the time and place is then and there; either by or in the presence of the President of the Senate and the two Houses of Congress. There is but one time, one occasion, in which the counting is to be done, and it must be disposed of in some summary manner; because if no person "have a majority of the whole number of electors appointed," then from the three persons having the highest numbers the House of Representatives shall "immediately," under the mandate of the Constitution, choose by ballot the President.

Again, the thing to be done is a ministerial, not a judicial act. To count is to identify and enumerate, not to choose. This like every other rational act of the human mind may require an exercise of the judgment, yet the act itself is nevertheless ministerial. All power in the premises must be derived from the single word "count." It is the alpha and omega of the grant. The question is not whether the State has done right or wrong, but, Is this its certificate, and are these the genuine votes to be counted? These inquiries are matters of identification, not foreign to the process of counting, but necessary to it. The "counters" in yon Treasury building identify and count the bills before them, selecting the good and rejecting the bad. This requires trained skill and judgment, but the act is ministerial. The tellers who stand in front of the Clerk's desk to take the sense of this House on any given proposition identify and count its members, as distinguished from others who might pass between them. This requires a certain exercise of the judgment, yet no one would claim that the act was judicial. The ministerial officer who holds the process of a court identifies and arrests, at his peril, only persons named in the writ. This may, and oftentimes does, require the most cautious exercise of the judicial faculties, involving the weighing of testimony in all its various shades and phases. He is nevertheless a ministerial, not a judicial officer.

In thus stating the thing to be done, and the time, place, and manner in which it is to be done, we but round the circle and meet again the real question in dispute, by whom is the counting to be done?

Whoever, either in or out of Congress, maintains that this question has been settled beyond all cavil or doubt, either upon precedent or authority, has evidently examined it in no spirit of candor, or, what is more likely, has not examined it at all.

Men of great eminence and of all parties have expressed themselves with reserve in regard to it, and in honest difference of opinion, without reference to political questions or partisan results.

One class maintain that the Constitution by clear implication confers upon the President of the Senate the power to count the votes, as much so as "to open all the certificates." Another class claim that the power to open all the certificates, being express, negatives the intendment of any further grant by implication, and the power to count votes clearly rests in the two Houses of Congress; while a third class maintain that the power is given in general terms to the Government of the United States, or to some officer or Department thereof, and that it is the duty of Congress, under section 8 of article 1 of the Constitution, to "make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying" it into execution.

Now while Congress may make all necessary and proper laws for carrying such a power into execution, it can make no law to take from an officer or department of the Government a power which the Constitution has vested in such officer or department; and to claim that it may do so in this case would be to beg the whole question; so that logically the first fact to be determined is, has this power been vested either in the President of the Senate or the two Houses of Congress?

Let us consider the question in the adverse order. It is claimed by many that the power to count the electoral vote is so clearly vested in the two Houses of Congress that to argue to the contrary is semi-revolutionary; and some go so far as to assert that any attempt to put in practice a different rule would justify the interposition of armed force to prevent it; while others contend that where there is doubt the more reasonable, safer, and better rule should prevail, which is to allow the two Houses to make the count.

Finally, it is maintained that from the organization of the Government to the present hour no President of the Senate, as a matter of fact, has either claimed or exercised the right to count the votes; but has opened the certificates and handed them to the tellers appointed by the respective Houses, who have made the count and ascertained the result, and that, so uniform and unbroken has been this practice, any attempt to change it now would justify the marching upon the capital of thousands and hundreds of thousands of unarmed men, thereby securing a calm, dignified, and proper construction of constitutional law.

Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as these men are to come unarmed, may we not venture to inquire whether there be not another side to this question? And if we may, then in prosecuting the inquiry let us remember that we are not seeking to determine what the framers of the Constitution should have done or what in our opinions would have been wiser if they had done it, but what, as a matter of fact, did they do. Sir, there is certainly one thing they did not do. They did not frame a Constitution for the purpose of electing Rutherford B. Hayes, Samuel J. Tilden, or any other mortal man in particular President of the United States.

There are certain other things which they might have done but which they did not do. They might have provided for the election of the President by the people direct, by the State Legislatures, or by the two Houses of Congress; but they did not do it. These various plans were duly considered, all giving away at last to the appointment of electors in the several States and the election of the President by them. These held certificates of their appointments from the executive authorities of the State, and, meeting on a day designated by law, cast their votes for President and Vice-President, and, certifying their action to the President of the Senate, he, on another day fixed by law, in the presence of the two Houses of Congress, opened the certificates, the votes were counted, and the result declared. Neither House of Congress was to have anything to do with the election of the President or Vice-President except in one contingency. Then why were they required to be present at the counting of the votes if they were to take no part in the proceedings? The fact that they are to act "immediately" in case of a failure to elect would require them to be present.

But, sir, I think there is another and all-sufficient reason why they should be present. Picture to yourself the President of the Senate on the day when the result of a presidential election was to be ascertained going into his retiring-room or away to his own residence, and there, with no witness present, with no one to molest or make afraid, opening the certificates, counting the votes, determining the result, and perhaps manipulating the figures to accomodate his own wishes or views. Would that comport with the dignity and importance of an event which was to change the executive head of a great nation? No, sir; the framers of the Constitution saw that this was not a thing to be done in a corner; and they required it to be done with dignity and decorum, in the presence of the great legislative bodies of the nation.

And right in this connection let me allude to another thing. It has been said that the President of the Senate has never in fact counted the votes because the two Houses have appointed tellers; and they have tabulated the figures and ascertained the result. Now, sir, picture to yourself again the Senate and House of Representatives convened in this Chamber, the President of the Senate occupying the chair in which you now sit; the certificates and votes are on the desk before him, and he with pencil and paper in hand is engaged in opening the certificates and figuring out the result; while three hundred and sixty-eight men gathered around the Clerk's desk to witness the accuracy of the count. Mark you, sir, I say nothing now of the one hundred thousand unarmed men crowding these galleries and corridors, and looking through these glazed doors "as through a glass darkly" to see that there be no "fraud in the hat." Is it not a sufficient answer to all this to say that if the two Houses are present in the capacity of witnesses, the tellers which they appoint are the eyes through which they see and inspect the fairness and accuracy of the count, and as such are indispensable to the performance of such duty at all?

Another thing. If we apply to the President of the Senate the technical and strict rule of construction that the granting of a power, in express terms, precludes the intendment of any further grant by implication, then the Constitution expressly requiring the two Houses of Congress to be present at the opening and counting of the votes, if it intended that they should do anything more, why did it not say so in plain words? The adding of the two simple words "by them" would have made all express and plain, in which case the provision would have read: "The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted by them."

Are we to be told, sir, that the framers of the Constitution were deeply impressed with the dangers which would beset a presidential election; that it would prove the heaviest strain upon the system they were establishing, and that they never could have intended to confer so important a trust upon any one man; and then, that they left it all in uncertainty and peril for the want of the use of two simple words? But it is said that the power is so vast and dangerous that both reason and common sense forbid the idea of any such individual trust.

Why, sir, to hear people talk, one would sometimes suppose that power had actually changed its nature in this country, and that under our system of distribution, checks, and balances, there was no longer plenary power anywhere, nor danger from its arbitrary abuse. On the contrary, what is the fact? Take the executive, legislative, and judicial departments of the Government, and how often does it occur that the will of a single individual may decide questions of transcendent importance. The opinion of one judge in a court of last resort, the casting of a single vote in either of these Houses, may involve the destiny of the nation itself; and yet, within the scope of its jurisdiction, what power on earth can control its exercise? Take from the holders of official trusts the restraints of self-respect, reverence for law, regard for public opinion, and your depositaries of power become so many magazines of danger; remove from the executive head of this nation these restraints, and he wields a power more vast and despotic than the Czar of all the Russias.

It is said that in the division of responsibility there is safety. Sir, as a rule of infallibility, I deny it. Men in masses will do things collectively which as individuals they would never venture upon. Hamilton said:

> In all very numerous assemblies of whatever characters composed, passion never fails to wrest the scepter from reason. Had every Athenian citizen been a Socrates, every Athenian assembly would still have been a mob.

Individual responsibility brings steadiness and care, and the awful penalties of betrayal hold men true to duty.

What have we just seen in this country? From the hour of sunset on the 7th day of November last until on the 6th day of December following when the votes were cast by electors for President and Vice-President there were one hundred and eighty-five men in this country each one of which held in his individual hand the power to make a President of the United States. These men were selected from widely separated localities, from all ranks and classes of the people; some of them were humble, some of them possibly ignorant, many of them poor, and yet for a period of thirty-four days, with the smiles of fortune, the blandishments of power, the advantages of gain, and the rewards of office dancing before their eyes, each one stood true to his manhood and true to his trust. Sir, there is in that simple fact, and in the stern public opinion which stands back of it and demands it, more promise for the perpetuity of this nation than from all the "embattled troops with flowing banners" which could be crowded within the confines of any one of the States of this Republic. These may be necessary; and if so I would see them used without hesitation. The sovereignty of this nation has been assailed once and the people are in no mood to see it trifled with again; but, that is indispensable, or there is nothing left to fight for; and shall we now be told that some eminent man, sitting perhaps in the very chair in which you sit to day, shall in defiance of all right dare to betray his high trust, and outrage the sense of justice of forty millions of people?

Mr. Speaker, if the plain reading of this clause of the Constitution taking the words in their ordinary sense, and an examination of the whole instrument, still leaves the meaning in doubt, then contemporary constructions become a legitimate method of interpretation.

Judge Cooley, in his work on constitutional limitations, says:

> Where there has been a practical construction which has been acquiesced in for a considerable period considerations in favor of adhering to this construction sometimes present themselves to the courts with a plausibility and force which it is not easy to resist. Indeed, where a particular construction has been generally accepted as correct, and especially when this has occurred contemporaneously with the adoption of the Constitution, and by those who had opportunity to understand the intention of the instrument, it is not to be denied that a strong presumption exists that the construction rightly interprets the instrument.

Now, sir, we have all become familiar with the fact that on the 28th of September, 1787, when the constitutional convention had completed its labors and was about to send the result down for ratification by the various State Legislatures, there went with it this memorable resolution, signed by George Washington, president of the convention:

> Resolved, That it is the opinion of this convention that as soon as the conventions of nine States shall have ratified this Constitution the United States in Congress assembled should fix a day on which electors should be appointed by the States which shall have ratified the same, and a day on which the electors should assemble to vote for the President, and the time and place for commencing proceedings under this Constitution. That after such publication, the electors should be appointed and the Senators and Representatives elected. That the electors should meet on the day fixed for the election of the President, and should transmit their votes certified, signed, sealed, and directed, as the Constitution requires, to the Secretary of the United States in Congress assembled; that the Senators and Representatives should convene at the time and place assigned; that the Senators should appoint a President of the Senate for the sole purpose of receiving, opening, and counting the votes for President; and that after he shall be chosen, the Congress, together with the President, should without delay, proceed to execute this Constitution.

It is said that this carries no weight because it proposes a mere temporary expedient for putting the new Government in motion; that it was necessary for the Senate to appoint a President to preside over it in advance of the election of the Vice-President being determined, because it was necessary, under the Constitution, for the presiding officer of that body to "open all the certificates." But does not the argument prove too much?

If the Senate and House of Representatives were to count the votes, these two bodies were already elected and in being. It was in their presence that the votes were to be counted and they were as competent to count them then and there as they ever could be. If the resolution had read "that the Senators should appoint a President of the Senate for the sole purpose of receiving and opening the votes," how plain all else would have been? There was a necessity for this, but there was and could be no necessity to appoint anybody to count the votes, because, if the Senate and House of Representatives were to do it, they were present, ready and competent to perform that duty. But the fact that a President of the Senate was appointed for the "sole" purpose of doing that very thing not only negatives, but utterly forbids all presumption that the two Houses of Congress were to do it.

Any pretense that the phraseology of the resolution was an oversight or mere inadvertence is overthrown by the following found in the opening proceeding of the Senate, showing how that body understood it:

> APRIL 6, 1789.
> The Senate proceeded by ballot to the choice of a President for the sole purpose of opening and counting the votes for President of the United States.
>
> John Langdon, esq., was elected.
> Ordered, That Mr. Ellsworth inform the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate is formed; that a President is elected for the sole purpose of opening the certificates and counting the votes of the electors of the several States in the choice of a President and Vice-President of the United States; and that the Senate is now ready, in the Senate Chamber, to proceed in the presence of the House to discharge that duty; and that the Senate have appointed one of their members to sit at the Clerk's table to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared; submitting it to the wisdom of the House to appoint one or more of their members for the like purpose; who reported that he had delivered the message.

The House responded as follows:

> Mr. Boudinot, from the House of Representatives, communicated the following verbal message to the Senate:
>
> Mr. President, I am directed by the House of Representatives to inform the Senate that the House is ready forthwith to meet the Senate to attend the opening and counting of the votes of the electors of the President and Vice-President of the United States.

The votes having been counted and the two Houses having returned to their respective Chambers, the following occurred, as appears by the Journal:

> Mr. Madison, from the House of Representatives, thus addressed the Senate:
>
> Mr. President, I am directed by the House of Representatives to inform the Senate that the House have agreed that the notifications of the election of the President and of the Vice-President of the United States should be made by such persons and in such manner as the Senate shall be pleased to direct.
>
> And he withdrew.
>
> Whereupon the Senate appointed Charles Thompson, esq., to notify George Washington, esq., of his election to the office of President of the United States of America, and Mr. Sylvanus Bourne to notify John Adams, esq., of his election to the office of Vice-President of the said United States.
>
> Ordered that Mr. Patterson, Mr. Lee, Mr. Ellsworth, be a committee to prepare the certificates of the election of the President and of the Vice President of the United States, and to prepare letters to George Washington, esq., and to John Adams, esq., to accompany the said certificates respectively.
> The following is the form of the certificates reported, adopted, and dispatched:
> "Be it known, that the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, being convened in the city and State of New York, the sixth day of April, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and eighty-nine, the underwritten, appointed President of the Senate for the sole purpose of receiving, opening, and counting the votes of the electors, did, in the presence of the said Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and count all the votes of the electors for a President and for a Vice-President; by which it appears that George Washington, esq., was unanimously elected, agreeably to the Constitution, to the office of President of the United States of America.
> "In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and seal.
>
> A similar certificate, substituting the word "Vice-President" for that of "President," and the word "duly" for "unanimously," was prepared for Mr. Adams. These certificates, accompanied by appropriate letters from Mr. Langdon, President of the Senate, were dispatched, by special messengers appointed by the Senate for that purpose, to General Washington and Mr. Adams.

Now, sir, were the members of this Senate men who could understand what they were doing, or what had been done by the two Houses? Turn to your Constitution and you will find that John Langdon, of New Hampshire, who says he "counted all the votes," and who subscribed this certificate, was the very first man who signed the Constitution of the United States. There were ten members of that Senate, and six of them had been members of the constitutional convention. Who was Oliver Ellsworth, who carried the first message from the Senate to the House of Representatives? A member of the constitutional convention, a member of that Senate, and the third Chief-Justice of the United States. Who was James Madison, who brought the return message from the House of Representatives? And who was Robert Morris? Did these men understand the use and meaning of language, and the force and effect of precedents?

Do you think when this certificate was received by George Washington, with his love of precise terms and accurate methods, that so gross a blunder could have escaped his attention and failed to elicit from him even so much as a comment? He had devoted his life to the resistance of tyranny and the usurpation of power. Would he sit quietly by and in the very first act of the new government see one man usurp to himself a power so important as this, one which was intended to be vested in the two Houses of Congress? It is said that the absence of debate at that time takes from these precedents their weight as authority. Why, sir, the absence of discussion, of question, or of doubt it seems to me amounts almost to a demonstration that the power was taken for granted; and that the idea that any one but the President of the Senate was to count the votes had never entered into the brain of mortal man.

Sir, I have not the time, nor is it necessary to give all the details of the nine successive counts of the electoral votes; but let us see how the Vice-Presidents and various Congresses understood the matter.

At the second counting of the votes, which occurred on the 13th of February, 1793, John Adams presided as Vice-President. One teller was appointed on the part of the Senate, and two on the part of the the House. Their duties were defined by resolution to be, "to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared." This was done, the result ascertained and handed to the President of the Senate, "who announced the state of the vote and the persons elected." Washington was re-elected unanimously, and Adams by plurality. Washington was notified of his election by a committee appointed from the two Houses; and Adams, having presided and announced the result, required no notification.

The third count occurred on the 8th of February, 1797, at which John Adams again presided as President of the Senate, and John Adams was elected President and Thomas Jefferson Vice-President.

Adams being present could easily be notified of his election, but Jefferson being absent the mode of notifying him became a matter of significant action. The counting was done on the 8th of February, 1797. On the 9th the committee of the two Houses appointed to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States, and of notifying the persons elected of their election, reported the following:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to give, by letter, to the Vice-President elect, a notification of his election.

On motion, it was agreed to insert President of the Senate instead of the Secretary; and

On motion, it was agreed to reconsider the resolution, and to recommit the report from the joint committee.

Mr. Sedgwick reported, from the joint committee last mentioned, that the committee on the part of the House of Representatives considered themselves discharged from their commission.

The Senate then asked for a committee of conference, which was granted by the House, and the committee appointed on the following day. The result of this conference was that the House of Representatives assented that the Vice-President be notified as the Senate might direct. A resolution was accordingly offered in the Senate that he be notified by the President of the United States in such manner as he should judge proper. This was voted down. The matter was then referred to a select committee of three, and the following form of a certificate was finally reported and adopted, and the Vice-President directed to sign the same:

Be it known that the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, being convened in the city of Philadelphia, on the second Wednesday of February, in the year of our Lord 1797, the underwritten, Vice-President of the United States and President of the Senate, did, in the presence of the said Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and count all the votes of the electors for a President and for a Vice-President; by which it appears that Thomas Jefferson, esq., was duly elected, agreeably to the Constitution, Vice-President of the United States of America.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and seal, this 10th day of February, 1797.

JOHN ADAMS.

Now, sir, did John Adams, the "underwritten Vice-President of the United States," who signed and sent that certificate to Thomas Jefferson, know whether he had "opened all the certificates and counted all the votes?" Or did he certify to it regardless of the truth? It will not do to say that it was a mere formal matter this time, for it had been a subject of action and discussion in the two Houses on three successive days, and the form of the certificate was the very thing under discussion.

The fourth count, had on February 11, 1801, resulted in a tie between Thomas Jefferson and Aaron Burr. The election was thrown into the House of Representatives, but who counted the votes? The certificate signed by Thomas Jefferson notifying Aaron Burr of his election as Vice-President contains the following:

Be it known, that, the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America being convened at the city of Washington on the second Wednesday of February, A. D. 1801, the underwritten, Vice-President of the United States and President of the Senate, did, in the presence of the said Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and count all the votes of the electors for President; whereupon it appeared, &c.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and seal, this 18th day of February, 1801.

THOMAS JEFFERSON.

Now did Thomas Jefferson, when he signed that certificate, know what he had done, or did the Senate, which passed the resolution directing him to sign the certificate stating that he had "counted all the votes," suppose that that was something which they, in connection with the House of Representatives, had just done themselves? There is another fact which renders the form of this certificate all the more significant. Only a year before the subject had been up in both Houses of Congress, had been freely discussed, and resulted in the passage of a bill through this self-same Senate, providing for the appointment of a grand committee to count the electoral votes, which bill was defeated in the House. Could any inference be plainer than that, in the absence of all legislation upon the subject, this Senate and Mr. Jefferson understood that it was not only the duty of the President of the Senate to count the votes, but that he had done that very thing.

At the fifth count, held on February 13, 1805, Thomas Jefferson was re-elected President and George Clinton elected Vice-President. Jefferson, being in Washington, was notified of his election by a committee of the two Houses; and under a resolution of the Senate the same form of certificate was directed to be signed by the Vice-President and sent to Mr. Clinton, which read:

Be it known that, the Senate and House of Representatives being convened in the city of Washington, * * * the underwritten, Vice-President of the United States and President of the Senate, did, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and count all the votes. * * *

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and seal, this 14th day of February, 1805.

AARON BURR.

The sixth count occurred on the 8th of February, 1809, when James Madison was elected President and George Clinton Vice-President. The same form of certificate was again employed, reciting that—

The undersigned, President of the Senate pro tempore, did in the presence, &c., open all the certificates and count all the votes, &c. In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the Senate to be affixed, this —— day of February, 1809.

This was signed by John Milledge, of Georgia.

Will it be claimed that this, too, happened through inadvertence? Why, sir, it was at this very time that petitions were sent to the House of Representatives from various towns in Massachusetts, remonstrating against the mode in which electors had been elected in that State. These memorials were discussed in the House on the 2d and 6th of February. Mr. Randolph expressed the opinion in the debate that "the electors were as much the judges of their own qualifications" as either House of Congress was of the election of its own members; and he said it appeared to him "as competent to the people of any part of this country to prefer a petition to the electoral colleges to set aside the returns of any members of Congress as to prefer petitions to this House to set aside the qualification of electors."

A resolution was offered in the House sending the memorials to the Senate and asking joint action on its part.

Mr. Jackson said he "hoped it would operate on the House to induce them to consider the propriety of providing some mode of hereafter distinguishing between legal or illegal or surreptitious elections."

Mr. Ransom was "opposed to the resolution. The Constitution having provided that each State shall choose electors in such manner as the Legislature should direct, why might not the House 'as well interfere in the election of Senators?'"

The resolution passed the House. The memorials were sent to the Senate on the next day and were laid on the table there. And just two days thereafter a resolution passed that body, directing the above form of certificate, which required that the seal of the Senate be attached thereto. And on the following day in the House, when a motion was made to amend the Journal so as to show why one elector from Kentucky had not cast his vote, it was stated by members, "if it was intended to fix a precedent to govern future proceedings it ought to be done with great deliberation." And the motion was voted down, receiving but 20 affirmative votes. And yet we are asked to believe that the Senate, right in the midst of these discussions, went on making certificate of facts and affixing its seal, without so much as giving a thought to form, substance, or future effect of the precedent.

The seventh count, had on the 10th day of February, 1813, resulted in the election of James Madison and Elbridge Gerry. And again, by direction of the Senate, "the underwritten, President of the Senate pro tempore," certified that he did "open all the certificates and count all the votes," affixed the seal of the Senate thereto, and sent the same to Elbridge Gerry to notify him of his election. This was signed by Joseph B. Varnum, of Massachusetts.

On the eighth count, February 10, 1817, James Monroe and Daniel D. Tompkins were elected; and again the same form of certificate, reciting that the underwritten, President of the Senate pro tempore, did "open all the certificates and count all the votes," was directed to be made by a resolution of the Senate. Signed by John Gailliard, of South Carolina.

On the ninth count, February 14, 1821, James Monroe and Daniel D. Tompkins were elected. It was on this occasion that a long debate took place in regard to the electoral vote of Missouri, in which Mr. Clay, Mr. Randolph, and others took part, Mr. Clay contending that it was the duty of the two Houses to count the votes, but that, as the vote of Missouri could not affect the result, he proposed that the matter be reserved and the result stated as it would be, both with and without the vote of Missouri. This was done, against the strenuous objection of Mr. Randolph, and while he was drawing a resolution declaring that the vote of Missouri should be counted the convention of the two Houses adjourned amid great disorder. The President was notified of his election by a committee from the two Houses, and he was requested to notify the Vice-President of his election.

On the tenth count, February 25, 1825, the election was again thrown into the House. John Quincy Adams was elected President by the House of Representatives and John C. Calhoun Vice-President by a majority of the electors. And again by direction of the Senate, certified to John C. Calhoun that he, as President pro tempore of the Senate, had opened all the certificates and "counted all the votes." Signed by John Gaillard, of South Carolina.

Thus out of ten counts, covering a period of forty years, the Senate has eight times directed its presiding officer to certify that he had "opened all the certificates and counted all the votes" and always with the assent and acquiescence of the House of Representatives. I know it will be claimed that in each instance the two Houses appointed tellers to tabulate the votes and ascertain the result, but do not wish to repeat what I have already said upon that subject. If this clerical work of the tellers would be indispensable, whether the two Houses or the President of the Senate counted the votes, then their appointment carries no significance; but the final certificate of the Senate does. It is to the final judgment, the signature of the judge, the seal of the court, that we look to see what has been done in the case; and, sir, if there ever could be such a thing as legislative construction it seems to me these eight several findings of the Senate are entitled to great consideration.

They have passed under the eye of the following illustrious men, and under the hand and seal of most of them: George Washington, John Langdon, Oliver Ellsworth, James Madison, Robert Morris, John Adams, Thomas Jefferson, Aaron Burr, George Clinton, Elbridge Gerry, James Monroe, Daniel D. Tompkins, and John C. Calhoun.

And under the rule laid down by Judge Cooley, that "where a particular construction has been generally accepted as correct, and especially when this has occurred contemporaneously with the adoption of the Constitution, and by those who have opportunity to understand the intention of the instrument," what importance is to be attached to such construction? It seems to me, sir, that at least it points out the course to be pursued in the counting of the electoral vote, in the absence of all legislation upon the subject. I do not ignore the fact that eminent men all the way down have contended that the power to count the vote was vested in the two Houses of Congress, while others equally as eminent have insisted that it was vested in the President of the Senate.

In this condition of doubt, what should be done in view of our present situation? I have believed from the first, Mr. Speaker, that the two systems should be blended, allowing the President of the Senate to decide all disputed points in the first instance, with the right of appeal to the two Houses of Congress; if they concur in overruling his decision, it is to be rejected, if not, it is to stand as final. This plan would insure a prompt and certain decision of the case, and by parties already present. Under it the vote of no State could be rejected without the concurrence of both Houses of Congress, and the objection that where the President of the Senate was himself a candidate he might recklessly and arbitrarily count himself in would be removed. In fact, all the objections that so important a matter should be left to the arbitrary will of one man would be swept away.

But it is said that it is impossible to adopt any such rule now, because partisan interests and partisan feeling will prevent it. Well, sir, if we are to enact only such legislation as partisan interests or partisan feeling shall dictate, we might as well abandon the attempt first as last. Still I shall be glad if any plan can be devised upon which we can all agree. In the present critical posture of public affairs we should go to the utmost verge of conciliation to agree upon a remedy. But in seeking such remedy it may be better that we bear the "ills we have than fly to others that we know not of."

The Supreme Court having power only to determine judicial questions, and this not being a judicial question, I do not think we have any power under the Constitution to confer jurisdiction upon that court to decide it. The propriety of calling in any of the judges of that court to aid in deciding the question where their decision is not to be final, but is to be revised by the two Houses of Congress, in which they cannot be present either to explain or defend their action, is a matter for grave and thoughtful consideration.

With what wondrous force do the words of Webster come back to us to-day! He said:

> One great object of written constitutions is to keep the departments of government as distinct as possible, and for this purpose to impose restraints designed to have that effect.
> The judiciary—
> He said—
> is composed of few persons, and those not such as mix habitually in the pursuits and objects which most engage public men. They are not or never should be political men. They have often unpleasant duties to perform and their conduct is often liable to be canvassed and censured where their reasons for it are not known or cannot be understood.

Add to this the fact that the plan is but an evasion of the plain spirit of the Constitution, which would confine that court and all its members to the exercise of judicial functions only, and the further fact that judges as individuals would thus become committed in advance and by modes extra-judicial upon scores of questions liable to come before them as members of the court, and you have the matter before you in all its gravity.

Sir, I should be glad to see my way clear to the support of the bill reported by the joint committee of the two Houses. But believing that under a certain very possible construction it would embark us upon a shoreless sea of doubt, without chart or compass to guide our course, while I realize the gravity of the situation and the great responsibility now resting upon us, and while I accord to the framers and supporters of that bill the purest and most patriotic motives, I am not prepared to say that I can sustain it by my vote.

But suppose all plans fail? Then, sir, I believe that from the very necessity of the case, in the absence of all legislation upon the subject, we are thrown back upon that doctrine, so often quoted, of Chancellor Kent, one of the most eminent publicists and jurists of America.

The opinion was given in moments of calmness, with no excitement to bias or warp the judgment. It was born out of the clear brain and in the pure atmosphere of a great judicial mind. It reads:

> The Constitution does not express by whom the votes are to be counted and the result declared. In the case of questionable votes and a closely contested election, this power may be important; and I presume, in the absence of all legislative provision on the subject, that the President of the Senate counts the votes, and determines the result, and that the Houses are present only as spectators to witness the fairness and accuracy of the transaction, and to act only if no choice be made by the electors. The House of Representatives, in such case, are to choose immediately, which, I presume, may be while the two Houses are together, though they may vote after they have retired, for the Constitution holds their choice to be valid if made before the 4th day of March following.

Sir, upon that doctrine as a last resort, when all else shall fail, I for one am prepared to stand. Believing, as I believe my existence, that, so far as a free choice has been permitted, Rutherford B. Hayes and William A. Wheeler have been chosen President and Vice-President of the United States by the American people, under the forms of law and the sanction of the Constitution, while I would yield much to reasonable appeal I would yield nothing to threat or bluster.

Standing upon the fact that the rules governing the election were well settled, that the legal methods for ascertaining the result were fully understood and were accepted in advance by both parties and the election held under them without protest, there is no reason for a departure from them now, unless indeed it can be shown that some fraud has been committed which shocks the moral sense of mankind.

That there has been one such fraud attempted admits of no dispute. As if seen by the eye of prophecy, it has been so well described only nine months ago by one entitled to rank as one of the prominent leaders of the democratic party that I borrow his language here. On the 13th of March last a distinguished democrat [Mr. BAYARD] said:

> It is very true that when the time shall come that the governor of a State, or any considerable number of persons, claiming any authority, shall certify a false certificate of a false claim of election in a State to affect the choice of the people of the United States of their Chief Magistrate, and there shall not be in both Houses of Congress a sentiment of honor and integrity that shall make such plans impossible of success, then the body-politic will be sick indeed, and will begin to despair of this experiment of men to govern themselves.

Sir, I am happy to believe that the distinguished gentleman who uttered these sentiments has said nor done nothing since inconsistent therewith. But the telegraph informs us that on the 23d of December last Governor Grover, one of the authors and finishers of the Oregon fraud, was serenaded at the Cosmopolitan Hotel in San Francisco, and I believe salves of democratic artillery greeted his departure from that city to the national capital, and here, we are told, he has been received and feted, if not openly defended, in high democratic circles. I am glad to believe however that many eminent democrats regard this whole matter only with horror and disgust.

Sir, show us that the much-berated returning board of Louisiana has been guilty of anything so indecent, so brazen, so monstrous as that, and I care not for law, precedent, or authority, outraged justice will rise and spurn it from its presence with contempt.

And if Rutherford B. Hayes would accept the Presidency of the United States, secured through instrumentalities like these, I for one should regret the day when I cast my humble ballot for him to fill that office.

No, sir. Let us cast all these things behind us, and, meeting the gravity of the occasion, as we entertain fixed opinions of our own, so let us tolerate them in others; and when the supreme moment for decision arrives let us summon all our patriotism, all our statesmanship, and all our manhood, to solve it as free-born American citizens should. But let us have no more of threats or violence, for "Whosoever shall fall upon that stone shall be broken; but on whomsoever it will fall, it will grind him to powder."

Mr. TUCKER obtained the floor.

Mr. WILLIS. I move that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WILLIAMS] have the right to print the rest of his speech, and also have the right to revise and correct the whole of it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is not in order, as the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. TUCKER.]

Mr. TUCKER. Mr. Speaker, in advocacy of the resolutions reported by the committee, I shall deduce the true interpretation of the twelfth amendment of the Constitution, from a consideration of the whole instrument and the nature of the Federal system it created; from the obvious meaning of the terms employed; from the history of their adoption; from the authority of the constitution-making power itself, and from the practice of the Government, settled by well-defined precedents.

The Federal system of the Union, by which the States, with their distinct Governments, exercise the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution nor prohibited by it to the States, and are united in co-operative action in the organization of the Federal Government, through their legislatures and their people, can be preserved only by securing the independence of the general and State governments in the exercise of their distinct powers and in the integrity of their separate organisms. To a certain extent, the dependence of the Federal Government on the States is such that it cannot endure if they should decline to elect Senators or to appoint electors for President. Its organism depends upon the faithful performance of these State functions under the Constitution.

And this appears also partially in the election of members of the House of Representatives; for suffrage is regulated by the constitutions of the States; and the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives are regulated by State laws; but lest these should injuriously affect the integrity of the Federal organism, these regulations may be made or altered by Congress, except as to the place of electing Senators.

This power, thus vested in Congress to make and alter State laws, is a self-protective power. It exists in and is essential to every vital organism in creation, and is equally necessary in all artificial organisms or bodies corporate or politic. It is true it is not complete against the perverse refusal of a State Legislature to elect Senators, but it is effectually so as to Representatives, and has been so practically even as to Senators.

But one complete protection the Federal Government has against a lawless or fraudulent purpose on the part of any State to put into either House of Congress a member not constitutionally eligible or not legally and fairly elected. It consists in the right of each House to be "the judge of the election, returns, and qualifications of its own members." (Constitution of the United States, article 1, section 5.)

This self-protective power in the Federal organism against the illegal, unconstitutional, or fraudulent action of the agents of a State in respect to those it is entitled to choose as its Senators or Representatives is absolutely essential to the constitutional integrity of Congress, without which it might be destroyed or be materially embarrassed in the efficiency of its action.

On the other hand, the State governments, in their respective organisms, are independent of the General Government and can in no respect be controlled by it, except that the form of their governments is guaranteed by the United States to be republican.

A striking evidence of the same important principle is to be found in the protection each has in the exercise of their respective powers from any interference by the other. Thus, while the States may not impair the power of the United States to borrow money or to pay salaries to their officers and the like, the same limit is placed by judicial construction upon the power of Congress in respect to the powers of the States and the salaries of State officers. (McCullough vs. State of Maryland, 4 Wheat., 316; Weston vs. City of Charleston, 2 Peters, 449; Dobbins vs. Commissioners, &c., 16 Peters, 435; Banks vs. Mayo, 7 Wall., 24, and many others; also Buffington vs. Day, 11 Wall., 113.)

Thus the Constitution has wisely furnished to each of these governmental organisms, the Federal and State, in our wonderfully framed federative system, a self-protection against the inimical action of the other, and the true friend of the system will sedulously guard each from invasion. While, therefore, the Legislatures of the States and their constitutional voters are the constituents of the Federal Legislature, each House of Congress is clothed with a quasi-judicial power which secures its constitutional integrity either from the unlawful or fraudulent action of the Legislatures or of the people or of the officers of the States. The States elect under their own laws Senators and Representatives, but the Senate and House of Representatives are respectively the judges whether the State laws have been strictly and fairly executed in these elections. The power of judgment in the Houses of Congress protects them from improper and lawless action by officials of the States.

The frame-work of the Constitution and the debates in the convention of 1787 fully sustain the position that the framers of that great instrument purposely and with great care made provision that, while the rights of the States should be substantially secured in the character of their delegates in both Houses of Congress, the purity and efficiency of each of these bodies should be preserved through the agency of its own self-protective powers; for it must be observed that, while it is essential to the preservation of the local and exclusive interests of each State that the Federal authority should not intrude upon it, it is equally important that as each State through its delegates in Congress does affect the general interests of all its sister-States these should have the prerogative to guard themselves against a member of either House whom the Constitution has not made eligible or who comes with a certificate tainted with illegality or fraud. To defend each in its local polity from the control of the other States and of the Federal Government is essential, but it is no less important to prevent any one State or its official agents from governing at its will the rights and interests of all the others.

When, with this preliminary view, we come to consider the constitution of the chief executive office of the Union we are therefore prepared to expect the presence of a like self-protective provision in the Federal organism, and the more so when we regard the large powers for good or evil and the important duties of the President. To suppose that no such device has been provided or so to construe the terms of the Constitution as to conclude there was none would be to cast a serious reflection on the wisdom of its authors and to bring incalculable mischief upon the country.

The articles of the Constitution relative to the Executive power will now be considered.

In the analysis of these articles it will be noted:

First. That each State appoints as many electors as the whole number of Senators and Representatives it is entitled to in the Congress. The State appoints.

Second. The manner of appointment is as the Legislature of the State may direct.

Third. No one can be appointed an elector if he be a Senator, Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States.

Fourth. Congress may determine the time of choosing electors and the day on which they shall give their votes, which day shall be the same throughout the United States. This is all the power which Congress has in the election.

Fifth. The elector cannot vote for two persons for the two offices, who are inhabitants of the same State with himself.

Sixth. No person is eligible to the offices of President and Vice-President who is not a natural-born citizen or a citizen at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, nor who is not thirty-five years of age, and has not been fourteen years a resident of the United States.

Seventh. The electors are to meet in their respective States, to vote by ballot for persons as President and Vice-President, and to transmit sealed and directed to the President of the Senate the lists of their votes signed and certified by them.

Eighth. In the opening and counting of votes and in the subsequent stages of the elective procedure, the President of the Senate and the Senate and House of Representatives have functions to perform which are at the present time most important to be defined and are the subjects of this discussion.

Before proceeding to discuss this question it may be well to call attention to two prominent points. Unless in the powers vested in the President of the Senate, or in the two Houses, some guard is found against State action, either fraudulent or violative of its own laws, or contrary to the Federal Constitution, the election of the Federal Executive is absolutely under State control, and may be decided by the unconstitutional, illegal, or fraudulent action of State officials, and the Executive of the whole Union may be elected by the malfeasance of some one officer in one State. Such a result is so contrary to the genius of the Constitution and to the provisions made (and already referred to) for the protection of the legislative department against like action, that it should not be considered a legitimate conclusion from a fair construction of its terms, unless clearly so intended.

Another point is this: Wherever else the power of decision may be reposed, it is clear, that it was not deemed safe to intrust it to the incumbent of the presidential office. To leave to him the determination of an election in which he may be a candidate, and to suppose it would be safe to intrust it to him, was so foreign to the thoughts of the framers of the Constitution, that his name is not even mentioned in any of the clauses concerning the presidential election. They knew too well, what history had taught by many examples, how often in the arbitration of right the sword had been thrown into the scale, and popular elections had been overthrown by the arbitrary domination of the military power in the hands of the Executive.

RELATIVE POWERS OF PRESIDENT OF SENATE AND TWO HOUSES.

Let us now proceed to determine the relative powers and duties of the President of the Senate and of the two Houses of Congress in the determination of the election of President and Vice-President.

The language of the Constitution is this:

> The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted.

This is as it stood in the original Constitution. In the twelfth amendment it is unchanged. This amendment was proposed after the celebrated contest of 1801 between Jefferson and Burr, and was adopted in 1804. This fact is persuasive to the conclusion that the proposers of the amendment thought the language of the above clause was a sufficient guard to the Federal Government from any schemes, illegal or fraudulent, by State officials against the purity and legality of the presidential election.

HISTORICAL REVIEW OF THE CLAUSE.

The history of the adoption of this clause will aid in its construction, and will enable me, by the inductive method, to ascertain the purpose of its framers, as manifested in the several stages of its growth to its final form.

No part of the Constitution gave to its authors so much trouble, or excited more diversity of opinion, than the mode of electing a President. It is the great difficulty in democratic institutions. History has shown that he who dispenses an enormous patronage, as the source of honors and emoluments, has ever gathered about him such influences antagonistic to the interests of the mass of the people, that in a popular election the parasites of the Executive will by their official power as well as by their votes present a fearful force against the defenders of the popular liberties; and when the sword is united with the purse, intimidation will extort from the fears of the electors what corrupt appeals to their selfishness may have failed to seduce them to yield. Many men of the constitutional era dreaded the ultimate fate of free institutions from this union of patronage with the military power in the hands of a President, and that he would finally command his own continuance in office or dictate his successor.

These apprehensions suggested a variety of propositions by which the evils might be averted.

By Mr. Randolph's original proposition, the President was to be elected by the "National Legislature." (2 Mad. Pap., 732, 733.) It was adopted by a vote of eight States to two, (ibid, 770,) and afterward unanimously. (Ibid, 1124.) In two days it was changed to an election by electors to be appointed by State Legislatures, (ibid, 1150,) and in four days thereafter it was restored to an election by the National Legislature, and so stood until it was moved to make the election by joint ballot, which passed, (ibid, 1419,) though much objected to by the small States who feared their being outvoted by the large States.

Mr. Morris proposed an election by electors to be chosen by the people of the several States. It was rejected. (3 Mad. Papers, 1421.) After all the propositions had been refered to a committee, a report was made in which a mode was proposed, which after many modifications and great debate resulted in that finally adopted. After directing that the votes of electors should be transmitted to the President of the Senate, the reported proposal proceeds thus:

> The President of the Senate shall in that House open all the certificates; and the votes shall be then and there counted.—Journal of Convention, page 324.

The requisition that the President should receive a majority of the votes of the electors, and if no person receive a majority, that then the Senate should elect a President from the five highest on the list, gave rise to an apprehension that there would rarely be an election by the electors, and the Senate would thus ordinarily elect. George Mason of Virginia, the author of the first bill of rights and first written constitution of a free commonwealth in America, both adopted on the 29th of June, 1776, said that—

> Nineteen times in twenty, the President would be chosen by the Senate—an improper body for the purpose.—Madison Papers, page 1430.

So also Mr. Charles Pinckney. Mr. Wilson, (afterward a judge of the Supreme Court,) preferred the ultimate election, on failure of one by electors, by the National Legislature, not by the Senate; and so Mr. Randolph. (Ibid, page 1492.)

Mr. Pinckney subsequently objected to the Senate as the elective body, because the President would "combine with the Senate against the House of Representatives." This view was also pressed by Mr. Mason, who said it fixed "an aristocracy worse than absolute monarchy;" and again by Mr. Wilson, who said "the President will not be the man of the people, but the minion of the Senate," and that the Senate could so contrive as to secure the election of President by themselves. Mr. Hamilton expressed the same opinion.

After much discussion, it was suggested by Mr. Williamson that the election (in case of failure to elect by electors) be made by the Legislature, (that is, Congress,) voting by States. Mr. Sherman suggested, as preferable, the following:

> The House of Representatives shall immediately choose by ballot one of them for President, the members from each State having one vote.—3 Madison Papers, pages 1510, 1511.

Colonel Mason liked the other mode best, as lessening the aristocratic influence of the Senate. (3 Madison papers, page 1511.)

This passed by a vote of ten States to one.

On the same day, the words in the clause first above cited "in that House" seem to have been stricken out; and the words "in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives" were inserted after the word "counted." But these words were tacitly transposed, so that the clause read thus:

> The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted.—Journal of Congress, page 337.

Now, compare the clause as it thus stands with the clause as originally reported, and we will readily see the revolution effected by the change of a few words.

First. The certificates are no longer required to be opened "in that House;" that is, the Senate.

Second. The votes are not to be counted "then and there;" that is, in the Senate.

Third. By the amendment to put the words "in the presence" &c., after the word "counted," the clause would have read:

> The President of the Senate shall open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted in the presence of the Senate and the House of Representatives.

This might have left room for the inference that the opener of the certificates was to be the counter of the votes; but the change was made so as to require the opening to be in the presence of the two Houses, and then the counting as a distinct act was to follow.

Fourth. In the original as in the substituted clause, the change of phrase in the first and second branches is significant. "The President shall open the certificates," and not "shall then count the votes," but "the votes shall then be counted"—not by him. Now it is impossible to avoid the conclusion that he is not to be the counter when the active form of the verb "open" in the first branch of the sentence is changed to the passive in the second branch as to the verb "count;" and when the passive verb "count" following "votes" as its nominative is not followed by the words "by him" as expressive of his being the instrument for counting the votes. If language can convey or exclude meaning, it would seem that this conveys the idea of a counting by some other than the President of the Senate, and positively excludes him as an actor in the count. Five words, "and then count the votes," would have made him the counter; but the use of the seven, "and the votes shall then be counted," clearly excludes such a conclusion.

But it is of more consequence to take a broader view, leaving this verbal criticism, however powerful it may be, in getting at the real meaning of those who used the language.

If the idea of throwing the election of the Executive into the hands of the State authorities without any revisory power in the Federal Government over the results of the election had been propounded, it could not have escaped the attention of the members of the convention that the person to fill the executive chair might be selected by State action contrary to the Constitution and to its own laws, and in fraud of the other States. Accordingly we find, when it was proposed that all the electors should meet together and decide finally without any reference to the Senate, and that they should "meet at the seat of the General Government," it received only one vote. (3 Mad. Papers, 1509.) This showed that it was not intended that the electoral body should pass finally upon the validity of the powers of its members, as they might thus palm upon the country one who was neither fairly nor legally elected; but it was designed to bring their right to act and vote under some Federal supervision, whereby the accession to the office of the Chief Magistrate would not depend upon the wicked or illegal designs of officials in any of the States. And it needs no argument to show that, if there was a proper repugnance to such a general meeting of all the electors at the seat of government to decide finally upon the election, there would be a deeper opposition to permitting a few electors in a distant State so to decide finally on their title to cast the State vote, with no self-protective power through the Federal Government to the other States whose rights might be so deeply affected by the vote of that State.

Hence it was determined, in order that these things should not be done in a corner where fraud or illegality might defeat the will of all the States, that the certificates were to be sent to the President of the Senate and opened in the presence of the legislative guardians of the Federal Executive.

Besides, when the convention first proposed taking the elective power from Congress and giving it to the States, it required the return of the certificates to be made to that body to which it confided the elective function in the contingency of its being found, on counting the electoral votes, that there had been no election. It vested the primary right of election in the electoral colleges, with a contingent elective right in the Senate, limited on the event of their failure to make an election. It would have been folly to leave to the colleges a final decision as to whether the contingency had arisen on which that elective right resulted to the Senate. Their action was required to be laid before the Senate in order that the Senate, and it alone, should decide whether the event had happened upon which the Constitution devolved the elective duty upon it. To have left it to the electors to decide would have been too absurd to be conceived in the minds of the Constitution-makers.

This proposed article of the Constitution therefore required the direction of the certificates to the President of the Senate, and the counting there, for a double purpose: first, to protect the executive chair from an intruder through the unchecked and arbitrary action of the States or of a single State, or of the officers illegally or fraudulently speaking for the State, and, secondly, to assure to the Senate its constitutional function of election when the contingency on which it depended in its judgment arose. Its judgment, not the judgment of any other body, could decide upon its prerogative and duty. To have trusted it elsewhere would have made the Senate dependent on another in respect of its constitutional and independent duty.

When therefore the certificates were transmitted and opened, it becomes proper to inquire what powers and duties were expected to attach to the Senate and its President respectively in regard to them. Did the convention propose the Senate or its President as the determinant authority as to these votes?

When this clause was originally proposed, the convention had not decided to make the Vice-President President of the Senate. It did so after this clause had been amended and was finally adopted. Hence we are to interpret the purpose of this clause without reference to the office of Vice-President or as being affected by its dignity. The power this clause granted was to the President of the Senate as such, and not because the Vice-President was afterward made ex officio its President. The power was conferred by reason of his presiding in the Senate—attached to that official function—whether performed by a Vice-President or a President pro tempore of the Senate.

But who is the President of the Senate? Either the Vice-President, an alien to the body, put upon it as its presiding officer by the Constitution, or one elected by itself to act under its rules, and executing, but in submission to, them.

Now could it have been intended that such a one, either an alien to it or its creature, was intended to debar the Senate of its duty at his will and shut its voice from protest against his illegal or fraudulent miscount? In the face of the proclaimed fears of the senatorial oligarchy, so patent in the debates, was it intended to exaggerate these by vesting the final determining power in one man, and he perhaps interested as Vice-President, either to continue in office or to succeed to the Presidency, or in another man who was a mere creature of the denounced oligarchy?

It cannot, then, be contended that as the clause originally stood it was designed to make the Vice-President or President of the Senate the final arbiter to count or reject the electoral votes of the States. He opens the certificates, and his functions cease. He is the medium through which the papers reach their destination. He opens them, not as an independent officer, but as President of the Senate, because they are directed to him. He is the custodian of them for the Senate, and when opened "in that House," it was intended that they should come into its custody and under its control, and to be counted under its order, for there, it is the master, and not he, whether he be Vice-President or its President pro tempore. The direction of the paper to a presiding officer of any body, to be opened by him in its session and there counted, puts the control of the paper in its hands and takes it from him and gives the count and its results to its supreme decision, excluding him entirely except as its minister. Any other construction would place either House of Congress at the feet of its own presiding officer, elected by it, or, worse than this, at the feet of the Vice-President, not a member of the body and not elected by it nor subject to it, and would make the mere organ through which it communicates with the outer world its master, and not the subject of its supreme will. Like the senses by which man is cognizant of the outer world, and which are his servants, and not his masters, the President of the Senate must submit to its order and yield unquestioning obedience to its mandates.

Any other view of the functions of the President of the Senate conflicts with the obvious meaning of the language of the clause. If he was to be the arbiter, not as presiding officer of the Senate, but as an officer distinct from that body, why was he required to open the certificates in that House? Why were the votes to be counted then and there? They were sent to him because he presided in the Senate, which was intended to count them in its House, where it sat and he presided. Now I put it to any rational man, can there be any higher evidence afforded of the subordination of the man to the body than in designating him, not as Vice-President, or in any other way than as President of the Senate, subject to whose rules alone could he exercise any function, and of which he was the servant, and over whose members he could exercise no authority except under its regulations? To suppose such a man was intended to have the power of an autocrat in a House where he was a servant, and to be a supreme arbiter where he was subordinate, is the extremity of delusion.

Again, if his illegal or fraudulent act was final, what function had the sitting Senate but to witness his wickedness? What motive can be assigned for its presence unless we attribute to it the power of prevention, as incident to and consequent upon the detection of illegality and fraud? Either his count was conclusive or it was not. If conclusive, what sense was there in having a Senate to see what it could not control, to detect a wrong it could not prevent? If not conclusive, then it was because his action was placed under the control of and subject to be avoided by the Senate as the real guardian of the integrity of the election; and if this be true, then the function of the President of the Senate is purely ministerial, and that of the Senate was supremely controlling and directory. He was intended to be its servant, not its master, in this matter, and the Senate was designed to be the supreme determinant arbiter upon the facts as developed by the certificates coming through him as its medium, and to it, as the real body to count the electoral vote, to decide upon the result, and to assume, if the constitutional contingency arose, the resulting prerogative and duty of electing the President. The creature of the Senate's appointment cannot be made the master of its will, nor deny to his creator its ultimate power of election, by his edict against its own decision. Such a conclusion is against the fair construction of the language of the clause, contrary to all the analogies of the Constitution, at variance with the tone of the debates in the convention, and an assumption for the "one-man power" of a prerogative against the will of the representatives of the States in the Senate too irrational and monstrous to be attributed to the Federal convention.

Nor is the hypothesis of a concurrent power in the President of the Senate with the Senate more rational. For while, if they agreed, no question could arise of relative authority, yet suppose they disagreed; suppose he said "count," and the Senate said no, which would prevail? The decision of the creature or his creator? If his prevailed, then the Senate's presence would avail only to echo his will, and never to oppose it. If its decision prevailed, then his power would be nugatory; being needless when he assented and impotent in dissent. If the powers of the two were intended to be equal, then the Constitution would have left a conflict without an arbiter.

I have dwelt thus long upon the true construction of the clause as it originally stood in order to see clearly the mind of the convention in suggesting it, and to trace the same general purpose into the clause as it was finally adopted; for if I have shown the presiding officer had no power to count except as the minister of the Senate, it cannot be claimed he has greater power under the clause as it now stands, when this House is brought in as a new element in the problem of related powers.

It is obvious that a jealousy of the power of the Senate existed in the minds of many of the ablest men in the convention. A majority of the Senate, in 1787, might represent but one-third of the people of the country; in 1876, but one-fifth. To give the ultimate elective power in a presidential contest to the Senate, and the decision of when this elective prerogative resulted to it, would have been to lend weight to the influence of an oligarchy against the popular will expressed through the electoral colleges. And this view was, as we have seen, urged with great emphasis in the debates of the convention.

After much discussion, as already shown, the convention, with remarkable unanimity, (Delaware alone voting in the negative,) adopted the plan of giving the ultimate election of President to this House, as the representative of the people of the States, instead of to the Senate as the representative of the States through their Legislatures. At the same time it left to the Senate the ultimate election of Vice-President, which was dependent, originally, on a much more remote contingency than that on which the power of the House depended for electing the President.

On the same day that this radical change was made, and obviously as a part of the same line of thought, the opening of the certificates and the counting of the electoral votes in the Senate was changed into an opening of them "in the presence of the Senate and the House of Representatives," and a provision that the votes be then counted.

Now, it is very clear that the function of guardianship of the election, which was assigned by the original proposition to the Senate alone, was by this change confided to the House of Representatives in concurrence with the Senate. The function of the Senate, which was exclusive under the former, was made concurrent and equal with that of the House under the clause as adopted. If, therefore, the reasoning already pursued be sound, by which the supreme control of the count was regarded as intended to be vested in the Senate, and not in its President, under the first form of the clause, it will with increased force conduct to the conclusion that under the clause finally adopted the powers of that officer are excluded in favor of the guardianship confided to the Senate and the House of Representatives.

And not only so, but this conclusion is enforced by another consideration. There might be a plausible pretense that the President of the Senate, usually elected by it, might have some power for the exclusion of the prerogative of the Senate, over which he presided; but no such pretense would avail in his favor against the prerogatives of that House by whom he is not elected, over whose procedure he has no control, and with whose organization he has no privity. If, therefore, the President of the Senate, as its servant, was intended to be subject to its mastery, under the first proposition, a fortiori he can claim no controlling power against this House, whose servant he is not, and to whose proceedings he is an utter stranger. Such a claim against this House by the presiding officer of the Senate is so absurd that its assertion would be a flagrant usurpation.

But another view is most important. The Senate in the original proposition had the supreme control over its President for another reason, that the decision of the contingency upon which its resulting elective prerogative depended would otherwise have been in the power not of itself, as it should be, but in that of its own creature, or of the Vice-President, most probably interested in the result. The same argument, and with stronger force, applies to the House under the clause as finally adopted. The resultant elective power as to the President is in this House. It is to be present at the opening and counting, not only as a co-guardian with the Senate of the election, but to decide when the contingency arises for assuming the high function to which the Constitution calls it in electing a President. The Senate is to be present to decide when the occasion arises for it to assume the duty of electing the Vice-President. The idea that this elective prerogative of the Senate is at the determining will of its presiding officer is absurd; but how much more so that upon the pivot of the arbitrary dictum of this mere creature of the Senate the elective prerogative and duty of this House should turn; that it should be denied its constitutional power by his edict, and that before his judgment the House should abdicate its power and decline to do its duty under the Constitution; that an alien to its procedure, appointed by another body, should give law to this House and control its own sense of duty; and, in fine, that this House, based on the will of the whole people, should be controlled in its constitutional power by the fiat, not of the oligarchy of the Senate, but of the creature of that oligarchy, is too preposterous to be believed as having been within the purpose of the wise men who framed our Constitution.

And this view becomes the stronger when we consider that the elective prerogative of the Senate was dependent on a contingency so much more remote than that of the House under the original Constitution and prior to the twelfth amendment. The House elected the President when two persons had a majority of the electors and an equal vote, or when no person had such majority. The Senate elected the Vice-President only when two persons had equal votes in a contest for the Vice-Presidency; for it was a strange principle in the original Constitution that, as no person was voted for by the electors as President or as Vice-President, the person voted for who had a majority of all electors appointed, and the highest vote, was President, and he who had the next highest vote of the electors, though not a majority of the electors appointed, was Vice-President. And thus it happened that John Adams was the first Vice-President, though not receiving a majority of the electors appointed.

Now, the argument from these provisions is this: If the President of the Senate could not exclude the elective power of the Senate as to Vice-President, depending on so remote a contingency, a fortiori he could not do so as to the House in respect of its election of the President, depending upon contingencies so proximate and probable.

These views seem to be conclusive against any determinant power of the President of the Senate under the Constitution in the matter of the electoral votes or of any function in respect thereto, except to receive and open the certificates sent to him, and through him to the Senate and House of Representatives; and that any other act he may perform is purely ministerial, and under the supervision and subject to the control and direction of the two Houses of Congress, in whose presence by the Constitution he must open the certificates and cannot do so elsewhere.

POWERS OF THE HOUSES.

Thus much being concluded, we approach the next important inquiry: What are the powers and duties of the two Houses, respectively and conjointly, in regard to the presidential election, and in what manner must they act?

My first proposition is that the functions of the two Houses are not merely ministerial, but are protective; and therefore must be in their nature quasi judicial, in the same sense in which all powers are which require discretion in the decision of questions of legal right arising on a given state of facts.

This may be established from several considerations.

First. If there was no room for controversy, if the mere question of adding up numbers and deciding whether the result was equal to a majority of the number, three hundred and sixty-nine, if the paper presented proved itself and the electors returned as voting were de jure entitled to vote, if the persons voted for were de jure eligible, if the conductors of the election and of the returning process were infallible and immaculate, then it might be conceded that the President of the Senate or a banker's clerk might do the duty of declaring the election of President.

But the convention knew full well that none of these hypotheses were or could be true. It did not even trust the President of the Senate to break the sealed certificates save in a presence where he could not perpetrate a fraud. It did not think it enough to guard this important ceremonial by a present Senate without a present House of Representatives. It debarred certain persons from being electors, and limited their field of selection by leaving the door of eligibility to the Presidency only partially open. It well knew that laws were violated by corrupt and interested men in conducting elections and making returns thereof, and that under color of law frauds might vitiate the results. From these evils it had provided a self-protective power in the organization of each of these same Houses whom it summoned to be present at the moment when the election of the Chief Magistrate was to be decided. Are we to presume that at this supreme crisis in national affairs the convention meant to leave the result to these hazards with no other guards than lookers on, who could witness, but with no capacity to protest or to prevent a fraud or illegality patent to everybody, including themselves; that if an incompetent elector voted, or an ineligible person received a majority of votes, or the State law for the election and returns was flagrantly violated, or was stained by such frauds as excited the most indignant abhorrence, there was no cure and no relief?

These considerations exclude the conclusion that no remedy for these evils was intended. And it is, as already intimated, clear that the framers of the Constitution did use language which was intended by them to furnish such a remedy, because, after the experience of the contest in 1801, which threatened the very existence of the Union, the same language is re-adopted in the twelfth amendment as was used in the original Constitution, a fact only consistent with the idea that it was believed in 1804 that those words justified the practice prior to that time and sanctioned the precedents which had recognized this remedial power, as will be hereafter shown. In other words, the adoption of the same language in the amendment of 1804, after its construction in the precedents prior to that date, gives a constitutional sanction to the interpretation of the language involved in these precedents.

Second. Without going into detail, it is clear that the addition of the presence of the House of Representatives, after the jealousy which had been expressed of the Senate, can only be explained upon the ground that it had some active function to perform, and not merely the passive function of witnessing what it could in no wise control. If it was intended to be an inactive spectator, there could be no benefit in requiring its presence in conjunction with the Senate, which, ex hypothesi, was to be as passive and inefficient as itself.

Third. But the language is full and express. The original proposition, while perhaps conveying the same idea as that finally adopted, is less striking and impressive. "The President of the Senate shall in that House open," &c., is not so strong as that he "shall, in the presence of the Senate and the House of Representatives, open," &c.

That word "presence" imports more than the being in the same room. It means radically (præ and ens,) "being before one." It indicates in all legal procedure a supervision by a present superior, one prompt and ready to control, to guard, to aid, and to defend. Everything done in the presence of a court is under its protection and control; even the presence of a witness to a testator, or of a testator to the witnesses of his will, is intended as a guard, protection, and defense against any imbecility or mistake in the act, or fraud in its procurement.

In that sublime appeal of the leader of the Hebrew exodus to the God of Israel, the same sense is found: "If thy presence go not with me, carry us not up hence!" This did not refer to the omnipresence of the Deity, but it meant presence in the sense of the divine superintendence, providence, direction, and care. It meant that wondrous pillar, the manifestation of Jehovah's presence: the shadow of his wings by day, the light of his face by night; whose majestic movement guided their march, and when and where the cloud abode there and there was the signal for their rest. But, whether moving or abiding, ever the divine symbol of supreme law enforced by resistless power!

It may be then taken, that the use of this word in this clause means an active, living, vital, controlling, and directing supervision of the whole procedure. If it does not mean this, it means no more than the casual or curious presence of by-standers, or of the crowd in the galleries. It cannot be that the word finds its satisfactory interpretation in the capacity of either House to witness a mistake it cannot correct, an illegality it cannot forbid, a wrong it cannot rectify, a fraud it cannot frustrate. Suppose the President of the Senate should miscount, (if by hypothesis he were to do the counting,) or should open false or illegal certificates; or produce those forged by himself; or propose to count ineligible electors; or to declare an unconstitutional vote of electors; or an ineligible candidate elected, must each House witness these things in mute submission? Or suppose the certificate on its face shows illegality, must it be accepted as valid? Or suppose on opening it a paper is found dated after it purports to have been sealed, is there to be no relief? If none, then the constitutional convocation of the two Houses is a mockery, and only compels them to give their countenance to lawlessness, and the sanction of their silent and acquiescent presence to fraud and wrong. Upon such a construction the majesty of the presence of the two Houses invoked by the Constitution becomes a solemn farce, a dumb show, an empty pageant, a miserable mummery.

Such a conclusion cannot be sound. A fair and just interpretation of the word gives full power to the Houses to control the count, to protect the people's voice from illegal or fraudulent schemes, and to act as the constitutional guardians of the executive office from the designs and machinations of wicked men. For the instant you give to the word "presence" the sense of any supervisory guardianship, it embraces all needed power to defeat fraud and prevent illegality. The wedge of power once admitted suffices to rive asunder all the outer covering of inward rottenness and lawlessness.

4. But this will further appear from the phrase, "and the votes shall then be counted." Let this clause be analyzed.

First. The votes. What is a vote? It is the voice of one devoted to a purpose. It is therefore the true, the unfeigned declaration of choice. Whose votes? The context answers, the votes of the electors. But who are they? A, B, and C claim to be, but so do D, E, and F. Which shall be counted? Or suppose only A, B, and C claim, and A is ineligible, that is, cannot give a vote; or suppose they voted viva voce and not by ballot. Must they be counted? Or suppose they met in Washington, and not in their State, or fail to sign and certify and seal, or are appointed otherwise than the State Legislature directs, must the count be made?

In each one of these cases the questions confront some determinant power, who is to count the votes; which are the votes? and who are the electors? Unless there be such a power the procedure balks at the start, and breaks down. If there be no such power in the President of the Senate, as has been shown, it must be in the Senate and House, or the Constitution is and has ever been a failure in declaring that votes shall be counted and providing no one to count them. The conclusion is inevitable that the two Houses are to count, and must determine what shall be counted as votes and what shall not be counted.

Second. When the certificates are opened by the President, the clause declares that then the count begins. They are opened before the Houses for what? That then they may be counted; and can be counted by none except the Houses, or those whom they may appoint as ministers for the purpose.

Third. "Counted." This word by many seems to mean merely the mechanical process of numeration. But this is far from satisfying the whole constitutional meaning. By the Constitution the President must be elected by the votes of electors, appointed in the several States, and casting their votes in a legal manner, and certifying and returning them in the mode prescribed by the Constitution. The President who has a majority of such votes is duly elected; but if declared elected by the pretended votes of electors, or by the votes of pretended electors, the declaration is false, and the election void, and the office will be filled by a usurper.

The votes shall be counted. You cannot count anything but the votes of the electors. Electors do not vote at all who vote contrary to law. The Houses cannot, dare not, in view of sworn duty, count as an electoral vote a vote claimed to be cast, but never cast, or of one cast contrary to law, or the vote of an elector not legally elected or ineligible.

Therefore, the significance of the word "counted" is greater than mere enumeration. Count (Latin, computo; French, compter,) means, as a learned etymologist tells me, to clear up, (implying scrutiny,) or as the dictionary says, "to reckon, to estimate, to weigh, to value." In counting money the idea is involved of discriminating between the spurious and the genuine, the light and full weights. And wherever it is applied to things which are not all necessarily alike, numeration, as the meaning of counting, must be supplemented by that of determining the character of the thing to be counted. Even the child in counting the marbles with which he plays must discriminate between what are and what are not properly included within the term.

This broader sense is found in many passages in that "well of English undefiled," the King James translation of the Bible. Saint Paul says, after enumerating his advantages as a descendant of Abraham, "What things were said to me I count but loss," &c.; "I count them but dung," &c.; "I count not myself to have attained," &c. In all these and like passages the notion of mere enumeration, proper for the counting of like things, is lost in the larger meaning of a discriminating estimate of unlike things, whereby one thing may in moral weight overbalance a thousand lesser things.

Thus it appears that the terms of the clause fairly interpreted lead to the conclusion that the votes must be counted by the Houses, and with such discretion, discrimination, and judgment that the result of a constitutional election of President shall be assured.

Conclusive as these views seem to be, there is one other that should be here prominently noted, though it has been referred to previously.

One great reason for the guardianship of the presidential office by the two Houses of Congress, as we have seen, was because each had a resulting elective power in case of a failure of election by the colleges of electors. This power, limited upon such a contingency, might be defeated were it not guarded by the House entitled to it and charged with the duty of its exercise. It would be contrary to all good government, as well as against all legal analogy, to exclude the holder of such a resultant power from a guardianship of the procedure on which it depended, or to leave to every other than itself the decision whether or not the contingency had occurred calling for its exercise.

The "presence" of each House, therefore, in the full sense which has been attached to that word, and the power to "count," in the sense of discriminating what ought and ought not to be counted, is essential to the contingent resultant elective right of each in case an election by electors fails; that is, of the House of Representatives to elect the President, and of the Senate to elect the Vice-President.

Thus much has been said in advocacy of the prerogative power of the two Houses. But we may advance to another position. The Houses have not only the power, but it is their constitutional duty, not a matter of option, but one of obligation, and not to be evaded, to take care that the procedure in the election of President shall be constitutional, according to the laws, State and Federal, and the true and fair expression of the will of the States. The powers of guardianship are reposed as a trust to be executed to the end for which they were granted; and the constitutional integrity of the executive department must be defended from all illegal and fraudulent attempts to palm upon the country an intruder, whose usurpation of the office under such auspices is as perilous to the peace as it would be destructive of the rights of a free people.

ARE THE HOUSES EQUAL IN POWER.

The power and the duty of the two Houses being fixed, the question next arises, are they equal in power?

That the two Houses were intended to be constituted co-equal and co-ordinate guardians of the legality and fairness of the election can admit of no doubt. If the clause as it now stands had been that first proposed, this conclusion would result from the mention of both, without a hint of a purpose to give to either a paramount power, or superior dignity to the other. Their constitutional relations to this high duty are those of equal authority and influence.

But this becomes the more conclusive in view of the historic facts already referred to. The jealousy of the influence of the Senate, as the representative of equal States, with no regard to relative population, suggested the summons of the House, as the representative of the States according to their population; and as, in the electoral colleges, the two elements thus manifested in the separate branches of the legislative department were incorporated into the elective body, so it was decided to have both present, with that quasi-judicial authority by which the election was to be determined and declared. To have given to either a paramount authority over the other would have defeated the purpose to combine the separate voice of each in the judgment upon the election, and would have made the amendment by which the presence of the House as well as of the Senate was required a meaningless device.

But if either was intended to be paramount, which was it? Which one has the Constitution made the superior? The one whose sole presence was unsatisfactory or that whose presence was required in order to quiet the jealousies engendered by the proposed single power of the Senate? If the Senate was designed to overrule the voice of the House, brought in from some supposed need of its presence, why invoke its presence at all? And if the House was to override the will of the Senate, why was its presence retained despite the superadded requirement of the presence of the House?

These questions admit of but one rational answer. The Senate and the House are in this solemn arbitration of equal weight in authority and honor.

HOW MUST THE HOUSES ACT?

This being established, we advance to the question, How must these Houses execute these powers? Must they act through their separate organisms or merge these into a new and single organism? Must each House utter its separate voice, or by a union of the members of the two make one body to speak the will of the conjoined Houses, constituted one for this object?

Many considerations conduce to the conclusion of the separate action of the Houses.

First. The language indicates separateness, with no hint of conjunction. If it had been required to be done "in the presence of Congress," there might have been some reason to argue for a joint act; though, as the constitutional definition of Congress is that it is a department "which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives," (C. U. S., article I, section I,) that argument would be fully avoided. But when the clause and its history concur in indicating a convocation of two bodies, in their nature, constitution, and rules of action wholly distinct; when the reason is that principle so deeply seated in our system of educing all its unity out of the concurrent majorities of separate bodies, rather than from a unification of separate bodies to bring out an enforced and false harmony; and when this conversion of the two into one would destroy the double guardianship of two co-equal protectors of law and right, and make a single sentinel, in whom the senatorial equality of the States would be lost in the overwhelming influence of the more numerous representatives by the House of the popular majority, we think it is too clear for doubt that the two Houses must act through their separate organizations in their judgment upon the presidential election.

Second. When it was at one time proposed to elect the President by "ballot of the Legislature" (that is, by Congress) it was so obviously intended to be by the separate action of the two Houses that a member of the Convention proposed to prefix the word "joint" before the word "ballot," in order to bring about the merger of the two in their elective procedure. It was objected to because "depriving the States represented in the Senate of the negative intended them in that House." It was at first adopted. (3 Madison Papers, 1417-'9.) But subsequently it was rejected by a vote of eight States to two. (Id., 1498.) Now, if the generic word "Legislature" (Congress) so clearly imported the separate action of the two Houses that the express word "joint" was needed to convert the distinct action of the two into a single act of one body made out of the two, a fortiori, it is clear that the mention of the two Houses by name cannot import, but excludes, the idea of the joint action of the two as one body.

Third. There is another reason, which will be more dwelt upon hereafter, that, as the resultant elective prerogative of the two Houses respectively was a strong motive for the presence of each to guard its own distinct right from being affected by the decision of the result of the action by the electoral colleges, that motive demanded that the decision should be made by the separate bodies, and not by one body, constituted by a merger of the two.

Fourth. One other reason may be stated. In the whole history of procedure by the two Houses under this clause both have always acted separately, and at no time has the merger of the two in one been adopted as the constitutional mode of their action.

It is then certain that the two Houses must act separately in their arbitrament of this presidential election.

MUST THE HOUSES CONCUR IN COUNTING OR IN REJECTING A VOTE?

This being settled, another question arises. The two Houses will either agree in judgment or differ. If they agree, unity between the two arbitrators leaves no room for controversy. It is as if there was but one.

But suppose they differ. If two equal powers diverge in judgment, that of neither can prevail, else they are not equal.

How then is the point in judgment decided? We answer, the affirmative proposition submitted is lost and the negative prevails. This is obvious, and is sustained by numberless analogies, which will occur to every one.

It is then obvious that the solution of our difficulty depends upon the nature of the question in issue. Whatever is proposed to be done cannot be done unless both of the equal arbitrators agree, and it will only be done when both concur.

What then is the question submitted to the two Houses? The proximate question is this: Who is elected the President and Vice-President?

The Constitution answers the question in these words: "The person having the greatest number of votes for President shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed," &c.

The Houses must determine what person has the greatest number of votes and he shall be President. What votes? Of electors. Who are the electors? The Constitution answers, those whom "Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct," so as he be neither a "Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States." How and where shall these electors, so appointed, vote? The Constitution answers, by ballot, and in the meeting in their respective States. How shall the vote of these electors be signified? The Constitution answers, by distinct lists made by them of the persons voted for, of the number for each, which lists shall be signed, certified, and transmitted by them, sealed, to the seat of Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate. How do they come to the knowledge of the two Houses? The Constitution answers, "The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and the House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted."

These are the steps by which the votes of the States come under the cognizance of the august presence of the two Houses, to be by them counted.

We have already shown that this counting by the two Houses is not mere enumeration, but is a discriminating estimation of the facts evidenced by the papers, purporting to be the certificates of the votes of persons claiming to be electors, and to have cast constitutionally votes for a person as President of the United States.

Has A or B or C received any vote for President?

A paper purporting to be a certificate avers that John Doe voted for A. Shall his vote be put down for A?

That depends on the answer to several questions:

First. Was John Doe qualified to be an elector?

Second. Was he legally elected an elector?

Third. Did he legally vote as such for A?

Fourth. Did he legally sign, certify, and seal the list on which his vote is set down for A?

Fifth. Is his vote for A valid, by reason of being cast for an eligible person?

Sixth. Has the certificate in which all this appears been opened in the constitutional presence, so as to exclude the idea of its falsity, and to establish the conclusion of its genuineness?

These, and other like questions, stand as challengers to the counting of that vote. If all are answered in the affirmative, it must be counted. If any one be answered in the negative, it cannot be counted. The power to count or not to count is as complete in the two Houses as the duty is imperative. The power and duty are correlative, and are connected indissolubly.

Suppose these questions are propounded in order to the two Houses. The House answers the first in the affirmative; the Senate, in the negative. How then can John Doe, who is not held by the determinant tribunal to be qualified to vote, be permitted to vote, and be counted for A? And so, without going into detail, as to the whole series.

The Houses cannot, dare not in view of their sworn duty, exercise the power to count such a vote, and then declare that A, having the greatest number of such spurious votes, shall be President, when B has a larger number than A of true and legal votes for President; unless upon the principle that the House which affirms must be held paramount to that which denies!

But it may be, and has been, argued that the questions submitted to the Houses are these:

Was John Doe disqualified to be an elector, or illegally elected, and so on, putting the question at issue in such a form as to require the Houses to vote on a negation rather than an affirmation of legality of an electoral vote; or in other words, to pronounce a man to be President not on the affirmance of his title, but on the ground that he is not disentitled!

In support of this view, it is argued, that the certificate is prima facie evidence of validity, and the votes must be rejected which are therein listed, or they will be counted. In other words, that on the prima facie case the question will be put, Shall this vote be rejected?

Conceding the premise, that the certificate is prima facie evidence of validity, the conclusion does not follow. It may be evidence of validity, but it is not conclusive. It is evidence on which judgment is to pass, but it does not per se establish a judgment in its favor. It is a material part of the evidence, from which with any other facts judgment must be formed, but in itself it does not command a decision until other evidence to rebut the prima facie case is heard. No judge upon the production of an obligation enters judgment for a plaintiff, and then considers the question whether it shall set it aside. He hears the whole case, and then decides affirmatively whether or not to render judgment; and where two equal judges hold a court, it was never heard, because a plaintiff makes a good presumptive case, on prima facie evidence, that on hearing the whole case the plaintiff will have judgment because the court are divided; and because on such division the court do not reject the plaintiff's claim to judgment. In such a case the defendant succeeds, because on the affirmative question, Shall judgment be rendered? the divided court cannot say it shall be entered. In Durand vs. Essex County, 7 Wall., this question is well discussed, and the conclusion I have stated is fully sustained.

If therefore the premise involved in the argument be true, the conclusion claimed is a non sequitur.

But the premise is false.

It is not true that the claim that John Doe was a qualified elector, or was legally elected, or legally voted, or legally signed, certified, and transmitted his lists, or that the person voted for by him is eligible, is prima facie valid. There is no legal or rational presumption in its favor. It is a thing to be proved. The Constitution requires the affirmative proof to be satisfactory before a vote shall count to make any person President of the people of a great union of commonwealths. To say that every package which any man may direct to the President of the Senate, purporting to be and clad in the garb of an official paper, is to be received until pronounced against, is to invert the forms of legal procedure and give efficacy to every ingenious fraud and forgery because there is a failure of proof that it is not corrupt and is not genuine.

But this argument is sought further to be enforced by a deprecation of the effect of the contrary doctrine upon the rights of the States to be heard in a presidential election. I am not insensible to such an appeal; but it is vicious in its logic, however commendable the impulse with which it originates. It involves the petitio principii. It claims that the vote of the State must be counted unless both Houses reject it. But the point involved in the discussion is that which is here assumed. Is the thing offered, as a vote, a legal vote? Is the vote offered the vote of the State? That is the question to be answered affirmatively. The opposite argument really claims that whatever is offered as the vote of the State must be so held, until it is so disproved as to obtain a concurrence of both Houses in its rejection.

Whether it be worse to stifle the voice of a State, or to attribute to it a false utterance; whether it be not more unjust to make a State vote against its real wishes than to refuse to let it vote at all—these are the real questions. The Constitution proposes to protect the vote of the State from fraud and forgery by refusing to give weight to her will unless it is satisfactorily shown that those who speak for her speak truly, and do not simulate her tone in order to despoil her of her right. Better refuse to count a vote in her name, where there is a reasonable doubt of its genuineness, than to cast her weight and influence against the true interests and genuine judgment of her people. Better stifle than falsify her voice—better forbid her to speak truth, than make her utter a lie.

These arguments do not avail, therefore, against the conclusions already stated, that no vote can be counted except upon the concurrent judgment of the two Houses; but those conclusions are sustained by other considerations which will now be advanced.

I have shown in an early part of this discussion that the great purpose of the convention was sedulously to guard the executive department from a usurper who might seek to win the Presidency by a violation of the Constitution and the laws or by the practice of fraud and forgery. It was intended that none should hold that high office whose title to it was either stained with fraud or wrested from an unwilling people by force, or was even clouded by a doubt of its legality or fairness.

Two guards were placed before the door of the executive department, the two branches of the legislative department; the one speaking for the equipollent State organisms, the other for the States according to their relative popular weight. The one is the sentinel of the States, the other of the people. This was the great self-protection devised by our fathers against a spurious title to the Presidency. No person could be admitted upon a title which did not prove its undoubted goodness, or merely because its badness was not proved beyond question. To doubt was to damn such a title to the Presidency.

What a vicious principle in respect to the peace of the country and the purity of its government, to the due obedience to law and submission to authority, would that be which permitted a President to enter office against the protest and judgment of the Senate, representing the majesty of the States, or of the House, speaking for the people of the Union? What a power would be given to faction, to fraud, and to violence, if one of the Houses could give a valid title to the Presidency despite the solemn dissent of the other?

Peace, subordination to lawful authority, public confidence and a true co-operation of all parts and interests in the country for its progress and prosperity, and respect and affection for its Chief Magistrate, have always followed and will ever follow the person whose legal and fair election is assured by the concurrent voices of both Houses of Congress; but these can never result when a cloud of lawlessness or fraud is attested by the divided judgment of the Senate and the House.

It will be perceived at a glance that if the Senate may by its voice adjudge a person elected against that of the House, the calling for the presence of the latter is nugatory, and, e converso, if that of the House in favor prevails over the dissent of the Senate, the retention of its presence was useless. It would result that neither House can ever avail to prevent the success of a claimant under a doubtful title. In other words, with two guards constituted against fraud and illegality, the sturdy challenger is paralyzed that the intruder may enter on the passport of the other. For it is clear that if both must concur to reject a vote, and one may count it against the voice of the other, then the two guards were constituted not to prevent a fraudulent intrusion upon the office, but really to facilitate it; for with the permission of one only to be let in and a requirement of both to be kept out, fraud and wickedness are at a premium in a strife for the Presidency. In a word, the effect of calling in the House as a guardian would be that the House might admit where the Senate would, if alone, have rejected, but could never reject where the Senate admitted; and thus, so far from both Houses being a double and effective guard against intrusion, they increase the chance of the intruder and decrease the hope of defeating a fraud upon the executive office.

And this becomes more striking when the historic fact is again recurred to, that the presence of the House was made requisite because the Senate might be ruled by an oligarchy, a majority of States being possible with a popular vote of eight millions against thirty-two millions, (or as one to four,) and it was designed to check its power by the popular majority represented in the House. But if the Senate may vote in one, whom the House would exclude, an oligarchy—which the convention meant to check by the power of the people—will triumph over the popular will and trample upon the rights of the people.

I repeat, the purpose was that none should enter the Presidency on any title not certified by the concurrent sanction of both Houses of Congress.

This will be made more conclusive by recurring to the second cause for the presence of the two Houses, to which reference has been made. That cause was the prerogative vested in the respective Houses to elect a President and Vice-President if an election by the colleges failed.

Nothing is more reasonable or better sustained by all the analogies of the Constitution, and of all law for the distribution and balance of powers than that, where a power is vested in a body coupled with a duty, there is an implied power in that body to assume its exercise without let or hinderance from any other authority. There must be autonomy, or there will be such a dependence as will make the required power nugatory.

In the original Constitution, as I have already shown, the House was authorized to elect a President if certain contingencies happened, the Senate to elect a Vice-President if certain more remote contingencies happened. It is, therefore, obvious that if the determination of whether the contingency had arisen in either case depended upon the absolute will of either body, other than that which is required to assume the elective function, a paralysis of its power and a defeat of its duty might result from the caprice of one not vested with the power nor charged with the duty.

Hence, if the Senate had continued, as first proposed, to be the sole arbiter of the electoral procedure, after the elective power was given to the House in case of a failure of the colleges to make an election of President, the Senate might have defeated at its arbitrary will this power in the House. And so as to the Senate power to elect a Vice-President, had the House been made sole arbiter of the electoral procedure. But the presence of both served and was intended to furnish to each House a self-protective guardianship of its own resultant elective function, and to enable it freely and without being subject to the capricious will of the other to enter upon the discharge of its constitutional duty by the exercise of its constitutional power.

For it is very clear that the power to decide whether or not an election has been made by electors may by unscrupulous men become equivalent to the power to elect, and that the power to count votes may be made superior to that of voting. The question who elects in such a state of things may be less important than who counts. The men who manipulate the poll-books or the ballot-boxes, and render a final decision on the result, if dishonest, may usurp the power of suffrage and turn a result favorable to T into an election of H.

To avoid this, in the case under discussion, the presence of each House as the guard of its own power, as the ultimate determinant of its own duty, was required. But all this would be unavailing if the power of either body to elect depended upon the counting of certain electoral votes at the sole will of the other House; for as the contingency on which the power of the House under the original Constitution depended is the failure of some person to get a majority of the electors, all that the Senate would have to do to defeat the power of the House would be to decide to count spurious votes for its own favorite, which, ex hypothesi, would avail to count them, despite the dissent of the House.

To a small extent, the same power might have been exerted by the House to the detriment of the power of the Senate; but not to an equal extent, prior to the twelfth amendment, for the contingent power of the Senate only vested, when there were two persons having equal electoral votes, after the person having the greatest number for President. It is true that now the contingent power of the two Houses stands on the same basis precisely, but we may reason of the motives to this clause, unchanged by the twelfth amendment, from the context to its terms in the original Constitution.

The objection (prior to the twelfth amendment) to the theory that either House could decide to count a vote, non obstante the dissent of the other, is therefore very strong, for it would involve the complete dependence of the contingent elective function of the House on the will of the Senate without a correlative dependence of that of the Senate on the will of the House. The Senate by its absolute fiat might thus wrest from the House this important power, which the House would have no constitutional means of defeating.

And as the Constitution now stands, since the twelfth amendment, each House would have the power to defeat the contingent elective function of the other, and yet have no power to protect its own, which is a result bordering on the absurd.

On the other hand, if, as we insist, either House may reject an electoral vote and both must concur to count, neither can defeat the other's elective power by counting improper votes, for thereby it equally defeats itself, while each is interested to reject a false vote in favor of its own power.

But it may be said that the House might, in order to get the power of election in its own hands, decide against a vote; and so the Senate.

This is more plausible than sound. The great function is electing the President; the Vice-President is of inferior consequence

If the House, representing population, and in which the populous States per capita should decide to reject a vote, in order to gratify an ambitious desire to elect a President, it would at once occur to its members that in its elective action the large States shrink to the size of the small; that on the procrustean bed of equal sovereignties the giant New York stands in equali jure with the dwarf Delaware, and thus the interests which decide on the count are dissimilar from those which would elect.

And besides, the populations so potential in the House would be the same which are so potential in the colleges; and it would be rare that to defeat a fair and legal choice by electors so likely to be in unison with their own views, the same interests would seek to take it to themselves when their power as populous States would be decreased to an equality with that of the small States.

It might be contended with more plausibility that the Senate would be interested to throw the election into its rival House, in order to defeat the will of the large States, so great in the colleges, and give force to State equality in the election by the House.

But this seems to be too refined a suggestion to fit the condition of things, probably existing. While the equality of States is represented in the Senate and operates in an election by the House, this is a single feature of likeness with all others dissimilar.

The House is the direct representative of the people. The Senate is that of the State Legislatures. The House is immediately sensitive to popular sentiment; the Senate only mediately so. The House is also fresh from the people; less so, it is true, than the colleges; but the Senate has only one-third of its members who represent popular feeling through State Legislatures as freshly as the House; one other third four years, and another third six years remote from the people's influence. In the election, the House represents the mass of the people of each State, though by an equal vote with all others. The Senate in decision upon the election speak for the legislative organism of the State, with only a remote sympathy with its people.

Therefore it is not probable that for sinister purposes the Senate would be tempted to defeat an election by electors to secure a President who would be dependent on its great rival for his election or to secure to itself the empty honor of electing its own presiding officer with the title of Vice-President.

Looking, then, to the reasons for the presence of the two Houses as a self-protection to each of its own resultant elective power and to the effects of the two theories upon the motives to their action, there is everything to sustain and nothing to impair the strength of the conclusion that no vote can be counted but by a concurrent sanction of the two Houses, and that any vote wanting this concurrence must be rejected.

It is singular that two apt cases have occurred in our history for the illustration of this branch of the subject.

In 1825 the colleges elected a Vice-President by a large majority, but failed to elect a President. In 1837 they elected a President, but not the Vice-President. In the former the Senate might be interested, as it could not possibly have any elective functions to defeat the contingent right of the House by a count favorable to one of the candidates. In the latter the House might have the same interest against the right of the Senate, and on the theory we are combating either could have destroyed the other's right by a count of false or illegal votes. But on the theory we sustain this would have been impossible in either case, for it is spurious counts which defeat the contingent elective rights spoken of; and, as no count can be made but by concurrence of both Houses, the House, whose right was jeopardized by the jealousy of the other, could fully protect itself by voting to reject where the other voted to count.

DOES THE REQUISITION OF A CONCURRENCE OF BOTH HOUSES IN ORDER TO COUNTING A VOTE IMPAIR STATE RIGHTS?

There has been some opposition to this doctrine on the ground that the effect will be to give to the two Houses of Congress an undue control of the State power in the election of President. This idea is the result of misapprehension.

Nothing is more essential to the preservation of the reserved rights of the States than the strict maintenance of the well-defined boundary between them and the Federal power. They are imperiled when indiscreet friends claim for them an abridgment of the Federal authority contrary to the Constitution. The fence between these should be kept up, so that neither can trespass upon the other, for the States may be well assured that the breach they make to filch from Federal power for their own interests will be enlarged for a more fatal breach by the latter on them.

Now, while the Constitution vests in the States the substantial power over the presidential election, the right of judgment in order to Federal self-protection is left to the two Houses. I would not trench in any degree upon the large discretion given to the States; but the right to judge whether State laws have been observed, and the elections authorized under their authority have been fairly or fraudulently conducted, has been and should be left to the Federal guardians of the executive department. To make the officials of each State the final arbiters of the validity of an election to be held and directed by State law is to put the election of the Federal Executive at the mercy of the officials of the States; and it is therefore entirely reasonable, while giving to the State the lawful control and direction of the election, to vest in the Houses of Congress the right to see that it was fair and legal.

And it must be noted that there is a a subtle vice in the argument which regards the Federal right of judgment as an invasion of the State right of election. This begs the question. The question is: Are the persons claiming to be electors appointed by the State in such manner as its Legislature has directed? This is assumed by the objector. Whoever claims to speak as an elector for the State must be tested by some determinant power. If not, he may falsely speak for her, and without her authority. The Federal power challenges his claim and protects the State thereby from his false claim. The spurious elector exclaims that we strike down the State by the blow which only feils him; but, if we silence one who speaks without authority, we not only do her no wrong, but defend her right against misrepresentation. It is better she should be silent than that her opinions be falsified by an unauthorized representative.

But another view is proper. This power of the States is federative in its nature and extraterritorial in its operation. As long as a State exercises its powers over its own interests, those which belong to its own people exclusively, Federal interference with the State is not only intrusive and dangerous to liberty, but unconstitutional. The convention rejected with emphatic reprobation the proposal that the governor of a State should be appointed by the General Government and that its laws should thus be subject to Federal veto, because the State autonomy would thus be destroyed and Federal power assume the management of all its local concerns.—2 Mad. Pap., 892; 3 Id., 1411.

But when a State by its legislation may affect the coinage, or the commerce, or the peace of the States with which it is united, or the obligation of its own to the citizens of sister States, when State authority reaches out to control interests beyond its own territorial boundary, compact limitations were placed upon State authority in order to protect the federative rights to be influenced by its legislation. And while its State governments are left to its people's will exclusively, yet when State action operates to mold Federal organism in its legislative department, a self-protection was furnished to the latter against the injurious action of the former; so that, though it was wise without Federal interference to leave each State to select its own rulers, yet, when it was admitted to the exercise of a power over the choice of the President for all the other States as well as for itself, it was just and indispensable that their rights should not be left to the uncontrolled caprice of a single State or the loose and dangerous action of its officials. Its rights could not be preserved at the expense of the equal rights of thirty-seven other co-equal partners in the Federal system, and especially when this right it claims is to a power exercised through the electoral colleges, which is no part of its reserved authority, but a power conferred upon it by the other States through the Federal Constitution.

We do not propose to impair the elective power vested in the States operating through the colleges. We only claim a right of judgment whether the power has been legally and fairly exercised and whether the free and true votes of the State have been cast or been tampered with or substituted by others through the frauds and illegal action of the officers whom the State has appointed to certify the results of the election.

This sudden zeal for the rights of the States by the republican party occasions us a surprise as real as that it feigns at our supposed abandonment of them.

In the defense of the local government of each State by its own people, the democratic party is unified in sentiment. But how is it with the gentlemen of the republican party? They have a zeal, but not according to knowledge. It is misplaced. When the local concerns of the States are in question they sanction the use of Federal power; but when the State's action affects Federal affairs they claim exclusive power for the State.

Their chief has placed his soldiers at the doors of the capitol of Louisiana and of South Carolina. His military subordinates have decided on the returns, elections, and qualifications of the members of State Legislatures. By the Federal bayonet the governments of the States are set up or put down at the will of the President.

But when the returns of one State would elect a President for the Union, and we assert our power to inquire whether they respond to or falsify the will of the people of that State, the republican party, with the iron heel of military power trampling in the dust the autonomy of the prostrate pelican State, withholds from our scrutiny the returns of an infamous board of oligarchs, reeking with fraud, as the evidence of its devotion to State rights and the love of a fair count, felt by itself as well as by its distinguished leader. We would exclude Federal interference in the local affairs of a State and protect the Federal organism against State control. But the State rights of our opponents are reversed. They increase State power where it should be diminished and paralyze it where it should be supreme.

IS THE PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE UNITED WITH THE HOUSES IN THE COUNT OR AN UMPIRE BETWEEN THEM?

But a new theory is broached, which I pause for a moment to notice in order to refute it.

It is that the counting power is in the President of the Senate and the two Houses; that he is the intermediary, or umpire, between disagreeing arbitrators.

This theory may be ingenious, but is untenable.

First. I will show hereafter it has never been broached in the twenty-two presidential elections which have occurred.

Second. All the reasoning already adopted as conclusive against his power, had the Senate's presence alone, (as at first proposed,) without that of the House, been required, is equally strong, and even stronger, as both Houses must be present under the clause adopted.

Third. But suppose he and the Senate—the Senate and its creature appointed, it might be, to enforce its power and make it paramount over that of this House—concur in counting a vote against the dissent of this House. Did the Constitution intend the oligarchy to become sole judge by giving it two votes by its own will against the one vote of this body? Did it intend to create an arbitration by the two Houses, with power in one arbitrator to appoint the umpire between them in case of disagreement? Was ever such an umpirage heard of?

This view must be condemned as vicious in theory, as it would be destructive in practice to the power of the whole people, in favor of the oligarchic authority of the Senate. It is but another mode of giving force to the exploded dogma of the exclusive power of the President of the Senate or to the paramount power of the senatorial oligarchy over the will of the people.

ON WHAT CONTINGENCIES DOES THE ELECTIVE RIGHT RESULT TO EITHER OF THE HOUSES?

One other question remains to be considered: the nature of the contingency upon which the right to elect a President results to the House and that of choosing a Vice-President results to the Senate.

The twelfth amendment provides that—

> The person having the greatest number of votes for President shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed; and if no person have such majority, then from the persons having the highest numbers not exceeding three on the list of those voted for as President, the House of Representatives shall choose immediately, by ballot, the President.

Each State shall have one vote, "and a majority of all the States shall be necessary to a choice."

WHAT IS THE MAJORITY REQUIRED TO ELECT?

What is the meaning of the words "if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed?" We have spoken of throwing out votes for illegality, fraud, or inability to decide who is really appointed. Must these be counted as among that whole number of electors appointed of which the successful candidate must secure a majority?

The word "appointed" indicates an affirmative answer to this question, and the history of the clause, as well as the context, confirms it. If it had intended to make a majority of the less number the word "appointed" would not have been added, and the word "voting" or some such word would have been used.

But the history is conclusive on this question. At first the clause read "if such number be a majority of that of the electors." This was at best equivocal.

It was thought, that as then the Senate was to elect, if no such majority was obtained, the election would most usually be thrown into the Senate. Many were very averse to this.

To prevent the eventual election by the Senate as far as possible, Mr. Madison proposed to insert "one-third" in place of "majority" in the clause. It was lost. (3 Mad. Pap., 1501.) He then moved to insert after electors, "who shall have balloted," saying, "so that the non-voting electors, not being counted, might not increase the number necessary as a majority of the whole to decide the choice without the agency of the Senate." It was lost. (Id., 1502.) Then "Mr. Dickinson moved in order to remove ambiguity from the intention of the clause, as explained by the vote, to add after the words 'if such number be a majority of the electors,' the word, 'appointed.'" It was adopted, nine States to two. (Id., 1502-3.) A change was proposed by adding, "and who shall have given their votes" after the word appointed. It was lost. (Id., 1509.)

This meaning derived from the debates seems to leave no doubt of the intention. But the context is equally conducive to the same conclusion.

The power to reject votes, of which we have spoken, would have enabled the Houses to reduce the number necessary to elect to a small minority. If a State attempts to elect and certify, and does elect some one, but owing to defective returns it cannot be decided whom, it would be unfair to count her out from all influence in an election from which her vote may be properly excluded. She would therefore be counted as of the electoral body, though her voice be not heard.

Again, when the election is thrown into the House, the person elected must have a majority of all the States, whether there or not, and a majority of the whole number of the Senate is needed to the election of a Vice-President. And by article 1, section 5, a majority of each House constitutes a quorum, but "one-fifth of those present" may demand the yeas and nays.

The distinction between a majority of the whole and of those present and acting is thus clearly manifest, and the words and context show that in this case the President-elect must have a clear majority of the electors whom the States have appointed.

But suppose an ineligible person be voted for. Is he appointed? Clearly not. He therefore cannot be counted among the electors appointed. The State has not appointed. Her act was null.
